California's misfortune is Florida's opportunity. Thousands will visit Florida who otherwise would have gone to California, so we want to show our resources off to the very best advantage. The orange, as an example, is indigenous to the soil of Florida. In weight and flavor it is naturally superior to the California-grown variety, and the climatic conditions are at least equal to those of California; and, as the price of lands is very much lower, Florida ought to secure many new settlers. All the conditions of Florida point upward and onward, so the man who invests in Florida real estate at present prices, whether in town or country, can scarcely make a mistake.—Ocala Banner.

We are happy over what we have done; we are happy over our prospects for this year. We can look everybody we've done business with square in the eye; we have treated them right.

Same methods next year
