ROSA ROSARUM.
Give me, O friend, the secret of thy heart
Safe in my breast to bide,
So that the leaguers which keep our lives apart
May not our souls divide.
Give me the secret of thy life to lay
Asleep within my own
Nor dream that it shall track thee any day
By any sign or tone.
Nay, as in walking through some convent
Close,
Passing beside a well,
Oft have we thrown a red and scented rose
To watch it as it fell.
Knowing that never more the rose shall rise
To shame us, while we dead;
Watching it spin and twindle till it lies
At rest, a speck of red.
Thus, I beseech thee, down the silent deep
And darkness of my heart,
Cast thou a rose. Give me a rose to keep,
My friend, before we part.
For, as thou passest down thy garden ways,
Many a blossom there
Growth for these—lilies and laden bays
And rose and lavender.
But down the darkling well one only rose
In all the year is shed.
And o'er that chill and secret wave it throws
A sudden dawn of red.

AMUSING MATCHES.

Once upon a time there lived a maid and a youth who were unusually famous for their beauty of face, firmness of character and originality of ideas. They belonged to noble families, and they were extremely fond of each other. One day the maiden, whose name was Zonda, brought forth a beautifully carved golden casket. "See!" she cried to Waldorf, the youth, "I have found this box. It has amused my ancestors for years and contains some matches. Perhaps you also may some day discover a box like it, for all families possess such a one."
With that she touched a small spring and the box lid flew open. Inside there were waxen matches of all colors. They were about five inches in length, and each match was divided off with four little brown circles, marking its inches just like a tape measure affair. These peculiar matches were indeed wonderful and fearfully constructed. As for the box, no matter how many matches one burned up, one would always find the little casket amply replenished by some mysterious agent.
"Come," said Zonda sweetly, "let us light some of these." Then she struck one of the tapers, and Waldorf did the same.
As the blue phosphorescent flames leaped into yellow, these children screamed with ecstasy.
A brook bubbled at their feet, birds swayed themselves in the trees, thrilling their flute-like notes in a frenzy of bird joy. A soft breeze kissed the trees and murmured through the slender grasses. Daisies laughed at shy violets, ground bugs chirped with the melody of nature, butterflies floated through the air with lazy grace, and over all the sun spread forth his golden, genial glow, quickening the pulses to the warmth of life and stirring nature and humanity to a depth of feeling for the great in general and soft in particular.
"Is it not beautiful?" cried Zonda, with flashing eyes. But the youth was awed by the splendor of it all, and his head was bowed as he answered in a low voice, "Yes."
"Ah! But we must not let our matches burn beyond this first circle," said Zonda, "because if we do we may become unhappy. Come! We will blow out these matches and light two more. Then we shall behold the same lovely scene over again. For I am content with this, are not you?"
Again the youth assented with a low answer, "Yes." But by and by he commenced to tire of the birds and flowers, and the sweet and simple picture of nature's life, and after he had observed this scene a few times he said, still in his awed, low breathed voice:
"Zonda, I am tired of all this. Let us try the second notch and see what the other scenes are like."
At first Zonda demurred, but he coaxed her in a gentle, persuasive way, and finally with tears in her eyes she allowed the tiny flame to burn through all the beauties of nature's freshness and beyond the first circle.
A strange sensation crept over the boy and girl as this transpired. A thrill of exquisite, harmonious energy quickened the pulse of Waldorf, while Zonda became possessed of a dreamy, tender mood of sweet thoughts and wonders. A large silver lake glowed before them under a shower of moonbeams. The night was hushed in a dreamlike glory. Occasionally the hoarse croak of a frog, the splash of a glittering fish, the whistlings of the trees, broke the mystic stillness, but save for these sounds the silent, witching beauty of it all was complete. The brain of the youth was quickened with a surge of powerful feeling, and Zonda's sweet voice was hushed by an exquisite shyness.
Again Waldorf spoke. This time his voice was full of a new strength, his tone more loud, more eager. His face was flushed with enthusiasm.
"Come," he murmured excitedly, "let us have the third notch burned."
"But we have only seen this once," replied Zonda with a sad hesitation.
"We can never see it again," he responded firmly. "At least, we could never see it again and have the same sensations. Of that I am sure." And the new strength of his voice made her glance up at him with yet more wonder, and the new expression of his face made her drop her eyes with a swift blush of rose color.
And so the third match was burned, and a foaming, writhing ocean swept the sands before them with terrific force. And the roar of the waves as they lashed the shores, and the whispered seethings of the white and green foam, and the glistening shells, the gleaming sands, the mighty bowlders, all impressed them with the grandeur and vastness of the ocean, the life of the world, and the restlessness of the universe.
And now Waldorf, perceiving that

Zonda shrank back from the spray of the waves and the brisk, salt scented breeze, clasped her frightened form in his arms and regarded her with a tender solicitude, and as he did so light leaped into his eyes which was reflected by a wonderfully responsive light in her eyes. And the ocean with its ever restless surging, the sun, the moon, the stars, the clouds, the universe, seemed to disappear in a glorious harmony of sounds, vague, vibrating sounds.
Her arms crept around his neck, her eyes flashed the lightnings of feminine nature, and his answered with the thunderous force of manhood.
And then again he said with a fretful voice: "Zonda, let us have the fourth notch. I weary of all this active scenery. It is too nervous, too exciting. I yearn for the calm again."
"No." And this time Zonda's answer was firm with that strength which is sometimes given to women when they realize that they are being wronged.
"No, Waldorf. We have wandered thus far, and now if you are not satisfied even after having discovered the grandeur of all nature, you never will be. If you are not possessed of the love you have sworn, and if you have simply been amusing yourself by tasting the different priceless wines of life, with no idea of a choice, except a shiftless desire to see everything and be nothing, the fourth notch I will not burn with you, nor shall you burn it either until you learn contentment, consideration and a few other things." And then with a sweet but heartbroken smile she closed the lid of the golden box and left him.
The days and weeks and months and years rolled by. At first he could not find himself at fault. It was all Zonda who was erroneous. She was a foolish, willful child woman. She had chattered too much. She had displeased him in every way. He hated her. He could not understand why he had ever cared for her at all.
And Zonda, while realizing how restless he had been with her through all the scenes of their young life, remembered how his discontent had made her also discontented, how his extreme harshness or his extreme tenderness had always been spasmodic and how cruel his anxiety for new scenes, new things, his eagerness for the world, his small interest in her—all these she remembered, and so put aside with aching thoughts her love for him, and tried to welcome hate instead.
But after four years had passed away Waldorf could stand the separation no longer. He returned to her humiliated, softened, gentle and calm. He told her that he could not live without her, that she must forgive his past harshness and burn the fourth notch with him; not that he desired to burn it for flippancy's sake, but that he thought that this time it might bind them more closely together.
"Waldorf," she said, the womanly sweetness of her character banishing all hatred and illumining her face with a soft light, "love, we have burned the first notch. Did you realize what it was?"
"Yes, Zonda, it was our friendship," he replied softly.
"And the second notch, Waldorf—do you not remember how you said it would be impossible to return to it, how you hastened to leave it?" And she paused for his answer, with tears in her eyes.
"Yes, darling, our first love." And his hands clasped hers with a firm, strong pressure.
"And the third, Waldorf—the wonderful, seething, restless third?"
"Yes, Zonda, the passion of the universe was in that third."
"And still, Waldorf, you were not satisfied. You left me when I was frightened at the roar of the ocean, you were not there long to support my fears, and so how would you be if I feared you and burned the fourth notch?"
To this he made no reply, but snatching a match from the little, gold casket that she had placed near by on a table he lit it.
"Come," he said firmly and gently, "look!"
Before them splashed fountains of all colors, above them the ecstatic, harmonious melody of a thousand flute-like notes thrilled the air again. The trees still murmured, the grasses still whispered, the butterflies still fluttered, the flowers still bloomed with gorgeous colors, the ground bugs still hummed, little lambs gambled around their mothers, in the distance the roar of the ocean thundered against a beach, and near by a silver lake glittered its lapping waters with a soothing sound. And above and around and through all this there came to the ears of these two the vital, subtle, vast chords of nature's rhythmic life melody—the realization of happiness complete, the memories of the past, the content of the present.
"Are you happy?" asked Waldorf with exquisite tenderness of voice.
"Ah, yes, so much so!" she responded. "And you, Waldorf?"
"I?" he said, flinging his head back and straightening his strong, young shoulders. "I feel like a god, and you are to be my goddess always. Is it not so, love?"
"Yes," came her soft whisper. And thus they burned the fourth notch, which proved to be the best notch of all.—Mary Rachel Gage in Boston Courier.

THE LOST COPPER.

"No, I wasn't crying neither! Can't a fellow rub his eyes?"
"Thout the neighborhood a-seem in fit to die o' their supprise!"
"Course I'm feelin' bad. We'd counted on a piece o' finger cake—"
Big an hot an thick an bully—me an Dick an Bill an Jake.
An we looked for the bakeshop, an we holler-ed as we went.
An we whooped, till on a sudden Bill he swollered o' the cent.
"Had it in his mouth, I tell you, where it'd be safe, you see."
So when we got to the bakeshop he'd know right where it'd be.
Wouldn't half to hunt through pockets 'mongst the narbles an the strings,
An the buttons an slate pencils, an the lot o' other things.
But could by his fingers on it in a second, mighty quick—
We was in a hungry hurry, me an Bill an Jake an Dick.
"I don't know just how it happened. Bill was holdin' 'im 'urrab!"
Same as an mighty happy, till a suddenly 'e saw
Somethin' awful must 'a struck 'im, 'cause he set an awful as death.
An he called a time or two, an grabbed his throat, an hit his breath.
But I never had an idy what it was his foolin' ment.
Till he turned an said, 'Boys, I have gone an swollered o' the cent!"
"Well, sir, my blood quit arunnin' with a somethin' like a jerk.
An my heart for nigh a minute seemed as though it wouldn't work;
Then we all began a talkin'—all at once—an swollered Bill.
Till he busted out a-sufflin' an a-cryin' fit to kill.
But that didn't help it any. Then Dick brightened up an said,
'Mebbe 'it'll roll out uv 'im if we stood him on his head."
"Well, we tried it. Bill was willin'. He was square about it all.
An he stood up endod nearly half an hour 'gin in the wall.
But no cent come out, as we see, so we give it up an quit.
An the cake that we had planned for—that was what we wasn't get.
So, o' course, I'm feelin' solemn, but I wasn't cryin'." Say?
You'd 'a said if you was fixed like Bill an Dick an Jake an me!"
