Good Will Makes the Second Order
Cost Less to Sell You Than the First

In accordance with all intangible things, good will is hard to place mentally. Like reputation, popularity and friendliness, it is so elusive that there is little wonder its value and existence are so frequently ignored. Like character and reputation in individuals—the things which enable anyone to associate with his fellows—good will is what perpetuates a business.

Good will is that which makes tomorrow's business more than a mere accident. It is reasonable expectation of future patronage based on some past satisfactory dealings. The promiscuous and casual customer does not pay the profits. It is those who come regularly. These persons have found the dealer trustworthy, and his goods of high quality, his skill and knowledge commendable. They have been satisfied with the treatment they have received in the past and loath, in the absence of a reliable recommendation or a special circumstance, to risk a transferring of their custom to another. It is this hope and probability that keeps the business going and gives it a selling value above that of leasehold, equipment and stock.
