Finds Vermont Farmers Willing to Stay on Job

 "New these farmers are about to take over the creamery with its costly building and apparatus. They will attempt to operate the creamery on a co-operative basis, and I sincerely hope that both the farmer and the ultimate consumer in Boston and other New England cities may benefit."
 "You don't see or hear of any New England farmer-millionaires or plutocrats. Yet down in Boston the big retail concerns are institutions of power and wealth."
 "Yes, to be sure, we farmers—not all—own our own automobiles and are equipped with the latest farm devices. In these days without the m we are lost. Save labor! save labor! Is our cry, or we will soon be driven out of our loved hills and valleys."
 "Some relief for the farmer who produces besides dairy stuffs grain and perishable produce might come with the establishment, say of a farmers' exchange in the city market places, where retailers might come and buy to exclusion of the jobber and middleman and to the mutual benefit of the producer and one selling agent of the grocer or pedler," Ruggles declared.

"We are not pessimists about the future—rather are we extremely optimistic, for we are sure that the time is near when the men of the city will join hands with us—will sustain us in our efforts to right things. We are not radicals nor apostles of the 'death to capital' class," he added.

Got a big place here, 'nuff to carry many more head. Too old now, though. I am happy and contented and a'doin' all I can to raise and raise some more beef."
 "These travelin' bures do all they can to keep prices way down. Just look at Boston beef prices way down. Just look at Boston beef prices, though—maybe somebody don't collect!"
