DRIFT ON COAST SEEMS TO BE TO RADICALISM

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 20.—The recent convention of the California state Federation of Labor at Bakersfield showed a decided drift toward radicalism as compared with sentiment in previous years, according to James W. H. Hays, president of the California Federation of Labor, in an interview with a representative of the Associated Press.

One reason for the increased activity of the radicals, according to Mr. Hays, is that a good many of the conservative labor leaders who have been sitting on the lid, as he expressed it, trying to hold the "reds" in check and steer the labor movement along healthy and legitimate channels, are getting tired of their job. "That is, he says, "they are tired of being abused and harassed by the radicals on the one hand and the employers on the other, and are beginning to show a tendency to let things go."

"Of course this gives the radicals the chance to get into things, and they do not fail to take advantage of it. I do not mean to say that all employers are playing into the hands of the radicals by this sort of inactivity and unreasonable way, but enough of them are doing so to make it difficult for any but the most stable of the conservative labor leaders to hold to their course."

One of the important actions by the convention was the adoption of a report by a committee appointed to formulate some kind of a plan looking toward joint control of industry by employer and employee, one of the declarations in this report being as follows: "The United States is a free country and should be the main factor and motive of all human effort and exertion."

A declaration that "no separate control of public utilities should be established as soon as practical plans can be worked out" along the lines of the Public Utility Administration Act of the United States which legislation should entail the rights of the supreme court to declare unconstitutional any law enacted by the congress of the United States.

Beet sugar refineries have been compelled to operate only in sections producing a supply of raw material, and to remain idle between crops, because of the fact that the vegetables utilized require treatment immediately after maturity, under established methods, says the Popular Mechanics Magazine for December. As a result, the cost of transporting fuel to the factories has been high since they are seldom located near coal mines, and their activity limited to a brief season. These impediments are declared to have been eliminated by a recently developed process, which extracts nearly 70 per cent of
