JACK, THE BUSHRANGER

An Exciting Story of the Australian Bush.

Strange Experience of a Young Englishman Who Went Gold Hunting in a Country Where No Man's Life Was Safe.

Reading in your journal an article headed "A Bushranger Interviewed," says a writer in Chambers, recalls to my memory a strange incident which occurred some years ago to my own brother, when on his way from Sydney to the gold fields, and for the accuracy of which I can vouch.

At the time of his arrival in Australia the country was in a state of panic; a reign of terror existed, caused by the daring outrages committed on parties on the journey to and from the diggings. Robbery with violence, assaults, shot down and large consignments of gold carried off, were of daily occurrence.

The bush was infested by a gang of desperate bushrangers, whose leader, under the cognomen of "Jack," seemed to bear a charmed life. For years he had evaded all the efforts made to capture him, though the military had scoured the bush. So soon was an outrage perpetrated that all trace of the perpetrators was lost, as if the ground had swallowed them.

He had a perfect knowledge of the most secret movements of the parties he attacked. He seemed ubiquitous, always occurring in such rapid succession and so far apart. Such an air of mystery hung about him that a superstitious feeling mingled with the mortal terror he inspired. He was represented by those who had seen him as a tall, powerful-looking man, with nothing forbidding in his appearance.

Even the mad thirst for gold could not induce the bravest person to undertake the journey alone. The gold-seekers traveled in large cavalcades, well-armed and determined to fight for their lives and property; one of these parties my brother joined. He was a handsome, well-to-do fellow, all fun and love of adventure, and a soon became a general favorite. The "track" for there were no roads at that time—ran for the greater distance through the brush some parts of which were so dense as scarcely to admit daylight. Every man was well-armed. My brother had brought with him a first-class revolver, purchased in London. This he kept with other valuables carefully hidden on his person, his other belongings being stowed away in one of the wagons. When they bivouacked for the night, care was taken that it was an open space, where a good lookout could be kept, to make sure against any surprise on the part of the bushrangers.

One morning it was found that during the night they had been, spite of all their vigilance, mysteriously and unaccountably joined by a stranger, who stood in the midst of one of themselves, as if one could imagine how or whence he came, and utter astonishment prevailed. He was a fine, portly man, from thirty-five to forty years of age, with an open, propulsive countenance and a friendly address—one who, under other circumstances, would have been an acquisition to the party. Not in the least taken back or abashed by the scant welcome he received, he took up his quarters in the presence of the party, he came forward boldly and told a most plausible story to the effect that he was a stranger making his way to the gold fields; that, notwithstanding the stories he had heard in Sydney of "Jack" and his comrades, he had ventured so far alone, but as he got further into the bush he lost heart and determined to join the first party he met.

He looked strange, but in any case, for any kind, not even provisions of anything to indicate that he was bound for a long journey. He made no attempt to account for his mysterious appearance, and the party agreed that the wisest course would be to await the progress of events, watch his every movement, and let him see that they were prepared to sell their lives dearly, if driven to do so. He seemed to have an unlimited supply of money, and to be generous about it, paying his way freely. He took at once to my brother, and the liking was mutual; in diggers' parlance they became mates, chummers, and walked together. My brother found him a well-informed, agreeable companion, a vast improvement on their rough associates; he seemed thoroughly to enjoy the society of the jovial Irish gentleman.

Between them, notwithstanding the disparity in years. The other members of the party were very anxious, fearing the man would take advantage of my brother's unsuspecting, trusting nature to obtain information that would be useful to him when forming his plans for the attack which was hourly expected—in fact, looked upon as a matter of time. My brother's fears allayed when, after a little, he would leave the beaten track and walk into the bush, remaining away for hours, and returning at the most unexpected times and places, showing throughout knowledge of the bush and all its intricacies and short cuts quite inconsistent with the story he had told on joining.

One thing struck my brother as strange but without exciting any suspicion on his part. When walking together he would suddenly stand become quite excited, and say: "Oh, it was here such an outrage occurred." "It was on the spot on which we are standing that the escort was shot down and a large consignment of gold carried off. They did fight like demons." He seemed to take the greatest pleasure in giving minute details of the outrage, and it was not long before he had been an eyewitness. But so thorough was my brother's belief in his new friend that even this did not shake his faith.

When within a few days of the journey's end, the stranger suddenly and quite unexpectedly declared his intention of parting company. He offered no explanation as to his reason for doing so, though through many anxious questions to impress it on them that he intended to go the entire way to the diggings with them. No questions were asked.

After a general and hearty leave-taking, which, however, did not inspire much confidence, as they were still within range of a possible attack, he asked my brother to take a last walk with him, and led the way into the bush further than he had ever brought him before, and a long distance from the beaten track. The first words the stranger said were: "Mate, don't you carry a revolver?" "Yes, and a first-class one. No such as got out here. I brought it from home."

"Show it to me," said the stranger; "I love a real good weapon," and without the slightest delay my brother handed him the revolver, which he examined carefully, and saw that the chambers were loaded. He remarked that it was the prettiest weapon he had handled for a long time. He walked a few steps in advance and, turning round suddenly, he presented the revolver at my brother's head, calling out in a commanding tone, "Stand!" his countenance so changed as scarcely to be recognized.

At last my brother felt that he stood face to face with the terrible bushranger but did not lose his presence of mind. In a moment there was a profound silence, first broken by the stranger saying: "Is there anything on earth to prevent my blowing out your brains with your own weapon placed in my hands of your own free will? The wild bush round us is a goodly one, and you are a man. The man is not living who could track my footsteps through its depths, where I alone am lord and master. Speak, man! What is there to prevent me?"

With a throbbing heart and a quickened pulse my brother answered: "Nothing but your sense of honor." "The man's face brightened and his voice softened. He raised his hand, and handing back the revolver, he said: "We stand now on an equal footing. You hold my life in your hands, as I held yours a moment ago. Yes, boy, and your own fortune too. But I trust you, as you trusted me. I would not hurt a hair of your head, and I have spared others for your sake. How, you will never know; but they owe you a deep debt of gratitude. You are a noble-minded fellow, and through the rest of my stormy life I will look back with pleasure on the time we have passed together. But, mate, you are the greatest fool I ever met. I brought you here, today to give you a lesson, which I hope you will bear in mind. You are going amongst a rough, lawless crew; never, as long as you live, trust any man as you trust me. If you are ever in a bind, and bound for you, revolver will be your only true friend; never let it out of your own keeping, to friend or foe. You are far too trusting. There was not a man of my name, today, who would believe from the moment I joined that I was Jack the bushranger. Well, mate, I am not going to tell you who or what I am, or how or why I came among you; but if this is restored, that you have no truer friend, you will never know what I have done for your sake. Now, mate, good-bye forever. We will never meet again in this world, and it is best for you. I should be so." With leading him back to the track by which he could rejoin his party, he wrung my brother's hand, turned and walked quickly into the bush, leaving no doubt upon my brother's mind that the front he had so bravely trusted was indeed the dreaded bushranger.

Getting Admitted

Estelle Bell, a young man dropped into the office of a Dakota lawyer and said: "What is a habeas corpus?" "It is a kind of writ for—"

"That's all I want to know about it. Is a mandamus a writ, too?" "Yes."

"Use pretty considerable of these writs in the law business, I reckon?" "Yes; there are a number of different kinds."

"What is the usual rate for making collections in the territory?" "We usually take about half."

"All right—thanks. You see I made up my mind this morning to become a lawyer, and wanted to get a point or two. I'm going over to get admitted to the bar now before court adjourns; I'll hang out my shingle in the morning."
