

ESTABLISHED JUNE 19, 1878

SINGLE COPY FIVE CENTS.

THOSE AWFUL RULES

Their Consideration by the House Revealing Party Secrets.

HOT DIALOGUES BETWEEN DEMOCRATS

Mystery of McMillin's Removal from the Rules Committee Explained.

HE OPPOSED SPEAKER CRISP'S PLANS

It is a Fine Family Row, with the Republicans as Delighted Spectators.

SOME VERY INTERESTING COLLOQUIES

Mr. Catchings of Mississippi Inaugurates the Fun—Mr. McMillin Returns a Vigorous Answer—Mr. Turner of Georgia Grows Interesting.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 2.—The debate over the house rules is developing considerable feeling between the Crisp leaders and some of the gentlemen who constituted the faction of his own party opposed to the speaker's administration in this house. This is made apparent by the vigorous manner in which they are fighting some of the proposed changes in the rules proposed in the interest of expediting business and preventing obstructive tactics.

McMillin, who is leading the democratic opposition to these changes, is being ably supported by General Hooker of Alabama, Mr. Turner of Georgia and quite a number of members of the democratic congress who oppose the adoption of any of the expedients of the Reed congress.

Plans of the Republicans. The republicans, led by ex-Speaker Reed, whose burly form is always in the house landscape, are using all their ingenuity to drive the wedge in between the democratic factions.

Mr. Turner of Georgia in an impassioned speech today rebuked his democratic colleagues who were seeking to reduce the size of the quorum of the committee of the whole in accordance with the example of the Reed congress, and warned them that if they continued to do so they would find themselves in the future successfully or consistently fighting against the iron.

During the progress of the discussion on the amendment to reduce the size of the quorum an interchange of personalities between General Catchings and Mr. McMillin attracted the attention of the house and gave an indication of the presentation of amendments under the shadow of this clause. He also pointed to the manner in which the salaries of assistant secretaries had been reduced by the last congress.

In answer to this statement Mr. Dockery declared that the salaries of these officials had only been reduced to the point fixed by law. Mr. McMillin spoke vigorously in opposition to this proposed change. He drew attention to the critical condition in which the finances of the country were now in. This clause of the rule permitted the only opening for a reduction in the regular expenses of the government. In the past, when the rolls were crowded with troops, it was through this salutary rule that a democratic congress had been enabled to restrain this abuse of federal power. With the treasury in the worst condition it had been for years, to break down this rule at the outset of the administration would be to advertise this congress as false as the very net to the plagues it had made to the people.

Mr. Simpson of Kansas, Mr. Holman of Indiana and Mr. Stone of Pennsylvania opposed the amendment.

Made Humorous Remarks. Mr. Cannon of Illinois made the humorous suggestion that it did not make any difference whether the clause was in or out of the rule, as it was only meant to fool the public. "When you were in power before," said Mr. Cannon, with a wave of his arms in the direction of the democratic side, "you did not reduce salaries or expenditures. We had the senate then, but it did not interfere with you. It, however, furnished you the excuse you wanted. Now that you have the whole shouting match the public will have an opportunity to judge you by your actions, not by your words and professions." [Laughter.]

Mr. Tracey then withdrew the amendment.

Mr. Kyle of Mississippi offered an amendment increasing the number of members constituting a quorum of the committee of the whole house to a majority of the members of the house. Under the rule brought in by the committee on rules 100 members are made a quorum in a committee of the whole. Mr. Kyle declared that this was not the time for such a radical change. Every bill raising revenue and making appropriations must be considered in the committee of the whole, and it was now proposed to reduce a quorum in this committee from a majority to 100 members. He declared it was against public policy and against public sentiment, and placed it practically in the power of 100 members to transact the most important business of the house.

Mr. Deamond of Missouri supported the amendment, and in doing so called attention to the fact that Mr. Outwaite in the Reed congress opposed just such an amendment.

Mr. Outwaite in reply stated that he was four years older in legislative experience than when he made that speech. [Laughter.] Continuing, Mr. Deamond said that the objections advanced four years ago were as good now as they were then. The entire

ON THE BULL SIDE

Wall Street's Enthusiasm Over the Financial Situation at High Pressure.

SPECULATORS THINK ALL TROUBLE ENDED

Passage of the Silver Repeal Bill the Basis of Their Hopes.

BUT THEY IGNORE IMPORTANT INTERESTS

Threatened Tariff Tinkering Causing Uneasiness in Mercantile Circles.

DISASTERS WILL FOLLOW LEGISLATION

Every indication that the Proceedings of Congress with Reference to Changing the Revenue Laws Will Be Attended with Danger.

New York, Sept. 2.—[Special Telegram to THE BEE.]—The weekly statement of New York's associated banks given out today makes a showing which Wall street generally construes as favorable. The surplus reserve increased $5,170,000 and the other items of special interest were changed as follows: Loans decreased $3,438,000; specie increased nearly $4,000,000 and legal tenders increased something like $1,100,000. Deposits have increased over $3,500,000. Much of the gold which arrived last week figures in this week's statement, and the increase in bank note circulation is also a factor in the statement. More than this, there is an increased flow of funds from the country this way. Everything points to the accumulation of money in abundance here. If the course of the stock market depends merely upon the prospective gain in funds there would be only cheerfulness in the situation.

The vote in the house of representatives was so much more pronounced than had been expected that Wall street got up a good deal of enthusiasm on the bull side of the stock market. It was taken for granted that what the house had done the senate would do, and the result has been a hurrah in the stock market during most of the week.

Wall street is a pretty cold-blooded place ordinarily, but occasionally its sentimentality gets beyond anything known elsewhere. Thus it has been that the silver repeal vote in the house has been followed by rapturous expressions and boom action. During the most of this week it has looked as if Wall street had come to the conclusion that the vote settled everything. Not only was free silver scheming ended and honest money established for good, and all that, but every one of the troubles in the financial situation had been wiped out.

Important Interests Ignored. Ex-Speaker Reed's warning that the millionaires would not be quite so even with the silver bill repealed and Senator Sherman's later suggestion that there are other things than silver legislation in the way of national prosperity were not given much immediate attention. But as the week closes the calm faces recited by these two stagers are beginning to get a more active countenance. There are many things remaining, even taking it for granted that the senate shall pass the repeal bill promptly, and that President Cleveland shall sign it, which do not betoken entire rejuvenation of everything. This is especially true as to Wall street.

It is, and for months has been, a favorite statement in the stock exchange district that while the rest of the country may not stand further trouble, Wall street has had its punishment and is through. Probably it will be found that precisely the opposite is true. Wall street has had a good deal of punishment that Wall street is through is probably far from the fact. The rest of the country is in a good deal better shape than Wall street, as Wall street, unfortunately, is discredited. Trade is restricted everywhere, and manufacturers, so far as merely the financial situation is concerned, have been accommodating themselves to conditions. Moreover, the conservative beyond anything known hitherto, and certainly the farming communities of the country have not been able to get into ways of extravagance.

Discouraging Features. Two or three discouraging things are ahead for interests outside of Wall street, however. One is the probability that real estate, just now higher on an average than it has been in twenty years, will have to go through liquidation. Another is that labor is about to be called upon to bear the brunt of business contraction. Nearly every one of the big corporations of the country is facing obliged to scale down labor contracts. Some managers are anxious to avoid wage reductions, and are cutting down the number of employees; but most universally the rule is going into effect of retrenchment in the way of labor expenditure. This is the most unfortunate feature of the whole situation. Manufacturers have for their chief worry now the uncertainty as to tariff legislation. About the only thing that can be depended upon is that the majority in congress is intent upon beginning tariff tinkering right away. The house, having followed Mr. Cleveland's instructions on silver legislation, is now energetically at work in the preliminary stage of tackling tariff reductions. It is the belief in conservative circles that not much will be accomplished by the tinkers, that the tariff will be pretty much left as it is.

Question of Revenue Important. In the first place, it is contended that the country is so sorely in need of revenue that however much the majority in congress may desire to smash impost duties, they must be restrained by the national treasury requirements, and tariff for revenue purposes, must needs be rather increased than diminished. None the less there is much uncertainty as to what will be done, and uncertainty is worse than anything else.

If congress would only close up its silver repeal business and go home, as Senator Hill of New York sensibly advised, the country would be a good deal better off. So long, however, as it continues in session, making mouths at the tariff and threatening to do this, and the other thing we can, hardly expect manufacturers to resume business and push forward with much earnestness. Congressional gabble means business nervousness and business contraction. It always has and always will. In Wall

WILLIAM'S SOLDIERS

Inauguration of the Autumn Maneuvers of the German Army.

REVIEW OF THE FIRST ARTILLERY CORPS

Grand Reception Given the Emperor on His Way to the Review.

METZ IS PREPARING FOR HIS COMING

Part of the Program There Looked Upon as a Warning to France.

FRANCIS JOSEPH BRAVES THE CHOLERA

He Will Attend the Maneuvers of the Austrian Army in Galicia Despite the Fact that Danger of Contagion is Imminent.

BERLIN, Sept. 2.—Emperor William left Coblenz for Trier at 6:30 o'clock this morning, accompanied by his suite and the prince of Naples. The empress followed on a later train. The municipal authorities at Trier made the most of the imperial reception. After driving through the main streets and receiving an almost continuous ovation the emperor proceeded to Euren, where he reviewed the First artillery corps. At 2:05 the party returned to Coblenz. At 3:00 there was a grand banquet at the castle. At 9 o'clock a grand tattoo was given in the castle. This was the end of the emperor's duty for the day. Although he had been busy for fifteen hours, he conferred with General Von Kallorhorn, war minister, and talked some time with the Italian crown prince before he set out on his supper in private.

Has Its Significance. Tomorrow the emperor will start for Metz, where preparations have been completed to make his entry a veritable march of triumph. This demonstration has considerable significance. It is not a mere coincidence that the German emperor and the Italian prince appear in Metz on the eve of the anniversary of Sedan. Every thing denotes that the chiefs of the Triple Alliance mean now to give France warning that she must curb the Chauvinism of her people. At no previous maneuvers has such a crowd of distinguished men, all interested for the preservation of German unity, been grouped around the emperor.

Upon arriving Emperor William will proceed first to the military field, which will be held in the presence of the whole sixteenth army corps. The road which has been cut from the station to the vast plain where the service will be held is spanned by triumphal arches. In the middle of the plain the great imperial tent has been erected. It has been surmounted with an immense crown, and has for the four corners gold eagles with wings outspread. After the field service the emperor will enter the Metz gate leading to the Parisian strasse and will pass under arches and over flowers to the Place Esplanade, where under the shadow of his grand father's figure in bronze he will watch the troops march past. All the municipal authorities, the usual company of maidens in white, and the bands of children with flowers, will welcome him formally to the city. At 3:30 o'clock the imperial party will leave for Urville, the emperor's new country house.

Francis Joseph Will Take Chances. Emperor Francis Joseph left Ischl this morning to attend the maneuvers in Galicia. It was decided early in the week that he should not leave Ischl until he should look at the Hungarian maneuvers, which will begin September 8. The press has raised such a clamor, however, about the exposure of troops in Galicia to cholera and has reproached the government so bitterly for assembling so large a force from the infected districts that the emperor felt he must show his willingness to brave all perils to which he subjected his army.

The district in which the operations will be carried out is swampy, rife with typhoid fever and dysentery and is bordered with the cholera belt. A report of the director of the Vienna hospital, Dr. Kowalski, and the Vienna board of health, warned the government that military operations in such a region must tend to spread the cholera. The only concession of the war office, however, was to agree not to call out the reserves from places known to be infected.

Rumors have reached Berlin that cholera has already appeared among the troops marching to the field to maneuver. Not Frightened by the Cholera. The cholera has failed to cause a panic here as the people have perfect confidence in the city's good sanitary condition as a protection against any great increase of the epidemic. At the instance of the municipal authorities the record of cases and deaths is posted daily at the town hall. Few persons take the trouble to read them. The district presidents in east Prussia have published regulations intended to prevent the importation of the epidemic from Russian territory on the Vistula.

CANNOT STAND CRITICISM. England's Royal Family Increased at the Attacks on the Duke of Connaught.

LONDON, Sept. 2.—The members of the royal family are greatly increased at the persistent attacks which have been made upon the duke of Connaught's appointment to the chief command at Aldershot. There was a repetition of these criticisms in the House of Commons last evening.

Lord Mortimer, Liberal, asked what authority there had existed for providing a steam launch for the use of the duke of Connaught when he was in command at Portsmouth. It was replied that it was provided on account of the necessities of the service and to enable him to visit the numerous points for obvious reasons, to oppose religious instruction in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools, with a view only to his comfort here for a few very few years, and make no other provision for his welfare, is to betray a stupid, shameful ignorance of who and what he is. It is to deny practically the immortality of the soul and supernatural order, and treat him as an animal. This is sheer materialism. From the contagion of such a view of education the consequences may be heavy and preserve our country, religious and secular education should not be divorced and cannot be divorced without detriment to both. As the separation of soul and body means death and dissolution, so the separation of religion and science inevitably results in the corruption of the latter. They who, for obvious reasons, may have any reservation in the schools, say the proper place for it is a home and in the church. Religious instruction is not given at home for the emperor's Archduke Stefan delivered the address of welcome, followed by Archbishop Hennessey of Dubuque on "The Catholic View of Education." The key to his address was contained in the following sentences: "To speak of educating a man in this or that science, in these or those branches usually taught in schools