will occur, the guests fearing grave developments. The working classes so far have held aloof, but the abettors of the rival parties are doing their best to stir them up.

A Le Petite Republicque special from Cayenne says the cruiser Dubouiet is lying off the Salut islands waiting to bring Dreyfus away.

He is going to Paris as the military adviser of the peace commission. I can't say how long the proceedings will last.

"What is the condition of affairs in the Philippines?"

"When I left the situation had decidedly improved. I don't anticipate any serious difficulty there with respect to insurrection. The measures taken by our government at the request of Admiral Dewey and myself are ample for the purposes required."

"What opinion have you formed of Aguinaldo?"

"He is a man about whom opinions in the Philippines differ. Some think him bright and well meaning, while others say he is intractable personally, but he is amenable to some extent to advisers whose counsels in the main he follows. He seemed to me to be getting on fairly well. You must remember he suddenly finds himself after many years of struggle in a position of unexpected influence and has naturally become inflated with a sense of his own importance. He may be difficult to deal with unless his advisers use their influence discreetly."

"Does Admiral Dewey share your views of Aguinaldo?"

"I cannot speak for Admiral Dewey. I express my own opinion only, though I have no reason to suppose Dewey would disagree with me. I have said."

"Do you consider the insurgents fit for self-government?"

"Hardly fitted for self-government. I doubt if they are at the present time. Their leaders are very intelligent and much more fitted for self-government as far as I can judge, than the Cuban insurgent leaders. The Philippines people, too, are relatively better off and better off absolutely than though they be, judged by any of our standards. I think it is better for the government to be retained than they will be perfectly amicable to the government of what power is to be established. The permanent forces in the Philippines may be relied upon to support a stable government. The people want peace. They are tired of disturbance. They desire to get to work to develop the undoubtedly great resources of the islands."

"Do you consider annexation of all the islands or Luzon only or merely the establishment of a naval base at Manila the best policy?"

"That is a big question to ask and one I cannot possibly answer until I am asked it by the members of the peace commission. To answer it in anticipation would be unbecoming. I don't deny that it is a grave problem."

"Did you consult Dewey about the advice to be tendered to the peace commission respecting the future of the Philippines?"

"Dewey and myself were of course in constant communication. I can speak for him if the peace commission require me to do so."

Merritt's reticence on Dewey's attitude was immovable. He turned the subject by saying: "We had a very fine voyage and agreeable company, particularly from Egypt, where several British officers who took part in the battle of Omdurman joined us. We found plenty to talk about in our respective experiences. These British officers are splendid fellows and enthusiastic soldiers."

Compliments for Merritt.

Captain Loggin of the Arcadia said: "General Merritt was the warm admiration of every one on board. His modesty and good humor were delightful and he mixed with every one. The Americans in fact, were in fact extremely popular altogether. Major Hale enlivened the evenings with his songs. Our passengers included Marquis Tullibrandine of the Second Life Guards, eldest son of the duke of Rohol, shot in the arm at Omdurman and who was decorated with the Victoria cross for distinguished bravery in having been wounded under fire; also several war correspondents returning from the Sudan, including the veteran Villiers of the Illustrated London News and Rums Bull of Black and White."

General Merritt was met by the American consul, Robert Skinner, and intended starting for Paris at 9 o'clock this morning, but owing to the delay of the doctor in complying with quarantine regulations was prevented and will leave this evening. The general dined with Consul Skinner with his staff, meeting a few leading American residents here. The morning was very wet.

While waiting on the quay a reporter asked the general whether it was true that he was returning to the United States to be married. He replied: "That is quite a personal matter on which I can say nothing."
