"SAVING THE COUNTY"

THE total amount of Sam Evans' advertising claim against E. Dohr and Dohr's cleaning and pressing bill against Evans is less than ten dollars. The difference between the two accounts is about $1.25. But already the county has been put to an expense of $19.55 over the affair, with more expense assured when the matter comes before the grand jury. This $19.25 is the witness fee, justice fees and sheriff's fees. It does not include the cost of the time devoted to the action by District Attorney Irwin, and of course does not take in the fee of W. H. Shaw as attorney for the defense.

When the matter comes before the grand jury it will of course be considered thoroughly by that inquisitorial body and the time of this jury and bailiff costs the county $24 a day. Five witnesses were examined in the justice court, and if these same five are examined by the grand jury the cost will be an additional $11. And should there be an indictment and trial, there would be still more fees heaped on. All over a claim for $5.25 and a claim for $4.

Perhaps some statistician can prepare some estimate of the amount of wood that could have been purchased, the amount of stationery that could have been printed, the number of miles of roads that could have been dragged, if, instead of burdening the county with these costs in such a trivial, personal little matter, the dispute had been settled by spitting at a crack or flipping a coin.

If such cases are to continue, why not establish the office of public bill collector? Let him be paid by the parties interested, not by the taxpayers.

Scattered Shots

IT'S THE MAN who knows how little he knows that can really be called the wise guy.

ONE BIG FEATURE established at the hearing yesterday is the fact that in these days newspaper men have more than one suit of clothes.

AFTER WATCHING a few people "ragging" on the sidewalks with the grace of a polar bear to the music of the mechanical pianos in the picture shows, local savants are working to find out whether it indicates a lack of brains on the part of these few, or an irresistible syncope in the music being ground by electricity.

CONSIDERING the number of Klamath Falls doctors who have been elsewhere this year studying the latest cuts and stitches in surgical lore, might it not be a good idea to have a short course here for doctors as well as for farmers? But we'll all hand it to these men, for their efforts are direct benefits to their patients.

SOMEONE COMPLAINS about a few merchants who, able to tell where an article was purchased by the color of the paper it is wrapped in, make a few remarks if it was bought from a competitor. But it is needless to say that none of these merchants are advertising in the Herald, for these advertisers are too busy waiting on their trade to devote any time to such brush league study.

THERE IS deep regret expressed by some that it is time to shed overcoats, for an overcoat, somewhat like Charity, can cover a multitude of shortcomings.

THE ANKENY CANAL matter is to go on the ballot at the May election. Interest your friends in the matter. Get them to register, so this nuisance can be obliterated.

Expert Observer for Belgian Artillery Is Monk, Not Soldier

Sombre Garbed Capucin, Hidden in Old Church Tower Gives Valuable Information as to Range, etc. Is Interviewed by William Philip Simms

By WILLIAM PHILIP SIMMS (United Press Staff Correspondent)

Phil Simms

FLANDERS, Feb. 20.—With the Belgians at the front, by mail to New York—The chief observer for the Belgian army, the man occupying the most dangerous post along the entire Flemish front, is a Capucin monk.

Hidden in a mediaeval tower of chimney-like proportions, but with walls six feet thick, part of an ancient church, this fighting man of God spends his days, telephone receiver at his ear, field glasses to his eyes, informing the Belgian artillery whether their shots are too long, too short or just right.

All day long his snagged tower, rising from a tiny island not more than 100 feet square, is bombarded and battered by German guns planted along the Yser. Only middle age masonry of granite mixture could stand this daily hammering, and even that must finally yield, for as this is being written the old church steeple is all jagged at the top, where half has been shot away, and great holes two feet deep pockmark its side. And when at last it collapses under the blows, the monk will certainly be there, for he stubbornly refuses to yield his place to another, even for a day or night.

For two months and two weeks he has stuck to his ruined church tower, surrounded by a flood of sea water and river water mixed, which inundates the country for forty miles in all directions. His post is the most desolate in Europe. When his superior officers, under the cover of night, go to him and beg him to take a rest, he smiles like an embarrassed child and replies:

"Why, I am less lonely here than in my cell."

Escorted by a Belgian staff officer on his rounds of inspection, I was permitted to visit the outpost. The night was pitch dark. Heavy clouds hung low, and driven before a forty-mile gale blowing in from the North Sea, a drenching rain stung us in the face. In the shelter of a roofed front line of trenches, dozing by the side of charcoal fires, the troops were to be envied.

Through a break in the trenches we started forward, but were stopped at the end of fifty feet by an entanglement of barbed wire. Then the officer flashed his electric lamp here and there to discover the secret path through the network. Instantly there came a challenge from the hooded of the wind, now and then lapped over.

We found the monk standing at the base of his steeple, looking with eyes, gray and tender as a woman's, in the direction of the Germans, now only 200 yards away. He was a small slim man, perhaps 30 years of age, with manners as gentle as a girl's. He smiled almost constantly, and was not the morose, brooding person one might imagine him to be, not the world weary individual looking for a way to commit suicide honorably. He loved life apparently as much as anyone, in his own fashion, and his martyr-like and self-imposed task of hourly risking his skin was purely an act of patriotism, a way of serving mankind by serving his country.

Prior to joining the order the heroic monk was in the artillery ranks of the army. When war was declared he got permission to leave his cell and get in his uniform again. His object was to serve God by fighting for King Albert. When the war is over and Belgium restored to her king, he says, he shall return to his cell, his usefulness in the army finished.

While we had been talking the rain stopped. It was now about 3 o'clock in the morning. The clouds thinned out and the moon came out as brilliant, almost, as day. The little island looked ghostly and ghastly, and the illuminating bombs constantly rising from the German line to prevent surprise attacks might have been jack-o'-lanterns or will-o'-the-wisps.

The island, the monk explained, is all that is left of a village. The other houses were crumbled by shells, and being on slightly lower ground, were under the flood. Two little shacks on the island were all that remained of the village—those and the ancient tower.

Here a little group of outpost soldiers, renewed every twenty-four hours, served Belgium under command of the monk, who alone never leaves his post.

entry on the other side of the network:

"Qui vive?"

"An officer," came the reply.

"Advance and give the word of the night."

The officer fumbled about for several seconds, finally locating the loose ends of the wires, which he turned back, slowly reversing the barbed mesh. We were allowed to proceed.

Once clear of the front line trenches and the barbed web we sloshed down the ridge called a road, the only land anywhere near us standing above the inundation. After a few minutes of this the road dipped slightly, and we found ourselves wading in the flood.

A horrible odor rose from the water—an odor resembling that of rotting cabbages and decaying flesh.

"What's that?" the officer was asked.

"Dead Germans, probably," he answered. "There are hundreds of dead bodies around here which we cannot get to and bury. They fell in trying to cross under fire. At night we can't locate the bodies."

Presently we left the road at right angles and took to a causeway three or four feet wide, made of small branches tied in bundles resembling logs. The path was just above the flood, and the water, under the force
