MUST CARRY OREGON.

The wire this morning confirmed the report which obtained circulation some weeks back and was strenuously denied by the democrats, that President Cleveland was especially anxious to see his party carry this state at the June election. Mr. John P. Irish, the brilliant paragrapher of the Alta, and the man whose pleasing oratory captivated everybody along the line of the last spike excursion, has been to Washington, and has received a special mission from Mr. Cleveland to see that Oregon goes democratic. To that end John is to come among the Webfets and try the effect of his persuasive oratory. Well, John is a good one; he will please, amuse and interest his hearers, and the importance of his work in hand, his heartfelt personal interest in it, will cause him to outdo himself. You see, John holds the key that opens the door to several appointments in California and John's brother, Charley, is surveyor-general of Nevada, all through Grover's kind feeling toward him, and it is important that he perform something great in return, and as John can manipulate the wires with as good grace and as little conscience as any man this side of the Rockies, you may all look out for a lively skirmish.

But the monumental failure of his ambitious endeavors has been one of the things that blighted John's life for a time and that gave to the Pacific coast the pleasure of his silvery tongue. The old time democrats of Oregon will be surprised while listening to Mr. Irish now, to know that in 1872 he preached the funeral oration of democracy throughout his native state, and termed it "a putrid corpse, past resurrection and unworthy of it." But then we are informed that he will be provided with a weighty "sack," for use in the large towns and cities, and if his nine years in California have not caused his hand to forget its cunning, that "sack" will be made to count. But, we predict that his canvass as a speaker will not gain fifty votes. All who hear will acknowledge his gifts as a flowery elocutionist, but as an orator, to carry conviction or give food for lasting thought he is not there. Without the "sack," he wouldn't be felt in the result; with it, he may succeed in capturing a hundred or two in Portland, but outside of that, with close watching, there is nothing to fear. Come on, John, anyway; we'll all welcome you and send you our confidence when the state of Oregon sits down upon yourself and Grover in such a manner you'll think Mount Hood has fallen on you.

HE MEANT IT.

It was scarcely necessary that Mr. Blaine should reiterate the decision announced in his Florence letter, that the republican party must look elsewhere for a candidate. The wording of that letter was not as emphatic as it might have been, but it was so evident to all thinking people that he had nothing to gain and much to lose by declaring that his name would not be presented in the convention, if under any circumstances he would accept the nomination, that even those who believe him nothing but an adroit politician had no excuse for not accepting his utterances as thoroughly sincere. He could have had the nomination without asking for it; and he knew, as did every one else of ordinary sagacity, that to reject it in advance and finally accept it would only exasperate those whom, if he was to be a candidate, he must conciliate. It could give him nothing that was not already his, and it would put beyond his reach much that he must have in order to succeed. To this conclusion all parties have been rapidly going, as the situation was thoughtfully considered, and if he had uttered no other word upon the subject, his withdrawal would soon be generally accepted as conclusive.

But the New York World did the republican party a service in obtaining an interview with Mr. Blaine, and giving him an opportunity to repeat his declaration in terms which cannot be mistaken, and give his reason for it in a way which will close the mouths of the few over-zealous and foolish friends who have joined with his bitterest enemies in insisting that his letter settled nothing, and that he was to be renominated the same as if it had never been written.

During this interview, which occupies three columns in Sunday's World, Mr. Blaine was asked if under any circumstances he would permit his name to be used as a candidate, and he responded with a most emphatic negative. "I hold," he said, later in the conversation, "that I have no right to be a candidate again. A man who has once been the candidate of his party, and has been defeated, owes it to his party to withdraw and not be a candidate a second time. More than this, there is another plain reason for my withdrawing. I could not go through the burden and fatigue of another presidential canvass—such a one as the canvass of the last campaign. To accept a nomination and to do less than that before would be impossible."

This is to the point and decisive, and it ought to satisfy everybody and end the discussion, so far as Blaine's candidacy is concerned.

Cities do not grow up of their own accord to-day, amidst the competition in town building. It requires effort, it costs labor, it needs united effort to bring the capitalists into a community. The way to build a city is to go forward and build it. To pave it, to light it, to sewer it, to stand by it first, last and all the time. There is a class of grumbling, whining, trembling, doubting fellows around every town who do more to retard the growth of the community than a dozen times their number can overcome. This class of property holders hold back and kick, and if there are not enough live progressive men to pull them and the balance, the growth stops. There is no accident about the growth of a town—it is the result of good business effort, of judicious advertising, and over and above all, it is due to men of capital putting their money into improvements and business and showing their faith in their city by their works.

Senator Evarts made many happy and original hits in his speech at the Republican League dinner in Brooklyn, and none better than this: "It is said the president has redeemed his pledge that 'public office is a public trust.' I am glad he has redeemed it. I am glad it has been called in. It will never be reissued, and will never pass current a second time.

Governor "Bob" Taylor of Tennessee is tugging hard at his boot-strings to hoist himself out of the scrape into which he got himself last year by appearing to approve the Blair Educational bill. He now declares that he does not like that particular scheme, but does favor Federal aid to education in the South.—N. Y. Tribune.

It is believed in Washington that Mr. Randall has forty tariff democrats at his back in the house of representatives.

The Sioux City Journal says: There is one thing particularly to which Grover Cleveland is not calling attention just now—his one-term letter of one year ago. Another thing is the protection plank in the last democratic platform.

Oregon Peach Bitters

About eighteen years ago I received a hurt in my back from a pile of lumber falling on me, and ever since had been troubled with weak kidneys more or less, and the last year very much. Through the recommendation of Henry Keene, I bought a bottle of H. Keene's Oregon Peach Bitters and before I had taken half the bottle I found a great relief from it. I believe it to be a splendid remedy for the kidneys, and heartily recommend it for the same. J. H. PORTER,
