FOUR TRAVELERS ON A SUNDAY TRAIL

A quartet of well known traveling men were traveling yesterday—traveling up the Basin road. When they reached the property of the Alaska-Juneau Company the party split in twain, two continuing up the Perseverance boulevard and two crossing to the mountain on the opposite side.

A simple minded pilgrim overtook the two travelers on the boulevard and excitedly pointing across the valley called the attention to a black bear and a mountain goat climbing up the mountain side. This brought a loud haw-haw from the two travelers. "That black bear," they said, "is Jack Chamberlain—the goat is Dave Terwilliger."

Chamberlain had on a heavy arctic overcoat and Dave was dressed in white summer outing flannels—but hot young blood moves swiftly—November weather carried no terrors for him. He was not nibbling grass; just searching for nice looking rock and Chamberlain wanted exercise.

The other pair of travelers, it was found, were L. E. Buell and O. C. Snetheu. These gentlemen being of an artistic temperament, were feasting on the beautiful panorama of mountain and turbulent waterfall, with now and then a regretful sigh that the rude hand of man must tear and destroy to get the wealth that is held in the rock-ribbed embrace of mother earth.

The simple-minded fellow moved on wading through three inches of slushy snow toward the road's end—swearing softly the while.
