Alaska Dog's Life Pictured by a Nome Woman

In a recent number of the Town Talk, a writer reviews a book written by Mrs. Darling, of Nome, in which the life of a malamute is pictured in the same manner as a horse's life was portrayed in "Black Beauty."
 Mrs. Darling is a Sacramento, California, girl and was a schoolmate of Mrs. Nelle Siddons Hall, of Bedrock creek.
 The review is as follows:
 No doubt my readers know that it was the dogs of Mrs. Esther Birdsall Darling, wife of the Alaskan merchant, who have won time and again the All-Alaska Sweepstakes, the classic of the North. They know also that Mrs. Darling belongs to the pioneer Birdsall family of northern California, and they may recall reviews of her book of verses "Up in Alaska," a volume which contained some very good poetry. But they can hardly be expected to know that Mrs. Darling is a writer of great charm in prose as well as in verse. Even Mrs. Darling's friends may not know how well she can tell a story, but they will be made delightfully aware of this when they read a little illustrated book of hers which A. M. Robertson has just published. It is called "Baldy, of Nome, an Immortal of the Trail," and in its modest way it is as good as "Black Beauty." Mrs. Darling has told the story of one of the racing dogs of the Allan and Darling stables with a charm that is irresistible, writing from a deep sympathetic feeling from a homely viewpoint of kindness and humor that Thompson-Seton or Jack London could not excel. "Baldy, of Nome," is one of the best little books by a Californian that we have seen this year or any year.
 One does not have to be a member of the fancy to appreciate this book. Its appeal is to all who love animals and like to have their ways studied and described sympathetically. Reading through the seventy-odd pages you come to know Tom, Dick and Harry very well, and Jack McMillan with his reputation for wickedness, and Kid and Meg who kidnap puppies, Barney and Mike, Priest and Irish, Wolf who was killed by the dog whose tail he playfully nibbled at, Dubby who takes the cat Texas out for a walk every afternoon, the tramp Nomie who goes to all the balls, fires and funerals, and especially Baldy. With Kid Baldy was chosen to lead the team in the great Sweepstakes of four hundred miles, and he led the team to victory, doing four hundred and eighty miles in eighty-two hours two minutes and forty-two seconds. He also led the team victory in the Solomon Derby, of sixty-five miles, besides saving his driver, "Ceoty" Allan, from death on the way. How Baldy did this is splendidly told in the book and forms a real addition to the list of well authenticated instances of canine sagacity. The Sweepstakes races, "those unique dashes across the snow-swept wastes of Seward peninsula from Bering sea to the Arctic ocean and return," are described with great spirit. There are delicious bits in the book as where Mrs. Darling speaks of cats as "only soft-footed, purring bundles of deceit, with no standard of Trail Morals." Altogether this is a good dog book, which means that it is a mighty good book to read. If you know the North you will appreciate it fully; if you don't it will add to your knowledge. Mrs. Darling has produced a little classic.
