

ONE MORE MAY ON TIME

City of Seattle Still on Another Excursion

In addition to the large list of excursions that are coming north this year the City of Seattle will sail on still another one before the end of the present season. Her first trip in August, sailing from Seattle, August 4, she will bring north those tourists who will be unable to find accommodations on the Spokane.

A circular letter to agents of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, announcing the fact that the City of Seattle will make an excursion trip, was received by E. A. Murphy yesterday. It says the trip was made necessary for the reason that all the accommodations of the Spokane for July 6th and 20th and August 3d were taken and many persons who are coming north could not wait for the trip of the Spokane sailing from Seattle, August 17. The City of Seattle will call at all the points made by the Spokane.

A Girl of the Russian Revolution

(Original)

Vera Nicholevna, the daughter of a Russian noble, began her revolutionary career by simply teaching the peasants. Finding that she could not do that under the present system of government, she joined those who are trying to overthrow that government.

One day Vera received an order from the revolutionary society of which she was a member to go to a little shop in St. Petersburg in the rear of pretentious buildings by which it was nearly hidden, get a bomb and carry it to a certain house at the other end of the city. She secured the bomb, made her exit and as she did so saw a man watching her from a window. Hurrying along she mingled with the crowd in the street before the watcher could emerge from his position. She judged at once that the shop had been watched and the man who had seen her come out was one of the police. The bomb, which she carried in her pocket, she could not get rid of. Revolutionary documents she might have dropped, but to drop a bomb meant an explosion. She did not doubt that if the man whom she was trying to evade found her she would be arrested and searched. For this reason she kept to the most densely crowded streets, moving in a tortuous course. Finally, turning, she looked back, and the very marrow of her bones froze at seeing her follower but a short distance behind on the other side of the street. He looked away, pretending not to have noticed her. Then she knew that he not only wished to capture her, but to discover the place to which she would go.

At this very time the guardian spirit that presided over the destiny of Harold Willetts, a young Chicagoan, led him to emerge from the building where he occupied apartments and stand in the doorway looking out on the street, swinging his cane meditatively. A young girl who was passing surprised him by suddenly turning and making straight through the door into the hall. There was suppressed excitement on her face, which led him to follow her. As soon as they were both inside she locked the door, then said something rapidly to him in Russian, which he did not understand. He told her in French that he spoke that language, and she at once adopted it.

"You are not a Russian?" she said. "What nationality are you?"

"American."

All foreigners consider Americans as sympathizers with any one struggling for liberty, and the girl at once gave him her confidence. "I am a revolutionist, and I am followed. In a few moments a man will be here to arrest me. I would care nothing for that, but I carry a bomb. Help me to get rid of it."

Willetts had been noted for his defiance and chivalrous treatment of women, but this appeal staggered him. Here was a girl, a very pretty one, who was asking him to mix himself up in a revolutionary matter from the consequences of which even the president of the United States could not save him if caught red handed. Nevertheless he had in him the blood of those who resisted the tyranny of King George III., and he rose to the emergency. "Give me the bomb," he said, "and go out by the rear door."

She handed him a glass globe, ran to the rear door and passed out just as there was a knock at the door in front. Willetts, instead of opening it, hurried up to his room. He knew that he had but little time to select a hiding place for the bomb and different receptacles passed in review with lightning speed. A pair of riding boots stood in a closet, and he carefully laid the explosive in one of them. Then he started downstairs. A man was in the hall talking to a servant who had just admitted him. He at once recognized Willetts and asked what had become of the girl who had gone back into the house with him. Willetts, not understanding the Russian language, could not reply, and the man, hurrying upstairs, searched the house, at one time standing directly over the bomb. Filled, he at last went away.

Willetts placed the bomb in his trunk and waited to hear from the girl. After waiting several weeks without any communication he wrapped the bomb in paper, tied a stone to it and dropped it in the river Neva.

The next winter found the young Chicagoan again in St. Petersburg, and, being on intimate terms with the American minister, he received many invitations through that official's influence. One evening at a ball given by one of the uncles of the emperor, being presented to the hostess, Willetts saw among the ladies of her suit the girl whom he had relieved of the bomb and saved from Siberia. The moment she saw him the roses left her cheeks, but with an effort she regained her composure without having attracted attention. Later Willetts was led up to her and formally presented. After a dance with her he led her to a window seat.

Vera told him that she had neither dared to go to him nor write to him. She felt that she owed him more than her life and had regretted that she had not before been able to express her gratitude. Willetts, who had been dreaming of her ever since the episode of her escape, begged her to permit him to call upon her. She resolutely refused, giving as a reason that she was consecrated to a work in which he could have no part.

Willetts never saw her again, but since his return to America the daughter of a noble answering to her description has been caught in a conspiracy to assassinate a grand duke. But as usual in such cases no information of what disposal has been made of her has been forthcoming.
