Renting a House

[Original.] One morning in April a gentleman was passing a cottage in the outskirts of a city on which was a sign "To Let." He stopped and looked at it.

"Why shouldn't I?" he muttered to himself. "I shall never marry, and I'm beginning to tire of spending all my earnings at my club or forced to go out and see some one. I've furniture enough to set up housekeeping, and a whole house would be much better than rooms in a bachelor apartment house—especially for poker parties."

A lady came along and, seeing the man looking at the house, asked: "Do you know to whom it belongs?" "I do not," he replied, raising his hat and looking into a very pretty face.

"I see it is to let," she explained, "and one renting a house had better deal with the owner direct. One can get better terms, for there is no commission to pay."

"That would be a woman's way," he replied. "Your sex are famous for looking out for salvages."

"If we didn't there would be no such thing as marriage in the world. Men can't run households as economically as women do. They would use up all the income long before the end of the year. I think I'll go in and take a look."

"Would you mind my doing the same. I promise you not to take the house if you want it."

"Certainly not; it is in open market." They went up the walk together and rang the bell. An elderly woman came to the door and admitted them.

"I think the house will suit you," she said—"that is, if you don't want it for a large family. How many children have you?"

The lady blushed and turned away, the gentleman, pretending not to have heard the question, went into the parlor and gaped at the ceiling.

"There's four bedrooms on the floor above," the occupant went on. "The front would do nicely for you two, while the children could occupy the other three."

The lady hurried back into the dining room and kitchen.

"They're mighty independent of each other," thought the occupant. "I wonder if they aren't only engaged."

The lady having finished inspecting the rear came into the parlor, where the man was still gazing.

"I don't know anything about the advantages or defects in houses," he said to her. "Would you mind my going through with you while you give me a hint here and there?"

"Certainly. I shall be happy to serve you."

The two went upstairs and the occupant remained below. "They don't need to be watched," she said to herself, "and I'll just keep on with my work."

The lady pointed out the qualifications of the house, but said it was rather large for her purpose, as she lived entirely alone. It would be better suited for a couple with one or two small children. The man was astonished that he had not noticed the defects or the advantages, all of which were as plain to her as the knave of spades to him.

"I don't want it," she said.

"Nor I," said he. "I shall remain in bachelor apartments. I am convinced that no man has any use for a house without a woman in it."

"And a couple of rooms will better serve a spinster," she remarked.

"A house must be very nice for two people who care to live together," he said musingly.

"There are certain matters a woman likes to leave to a man," she remarked in the same tone.

"And household affairs must be under the care of a woman."

They went downstairs together, thanked the occupant for having so kindly shown them the house and went out. There was but one line of street cars for them to take to get back into town, so they got aboard the same car.

"That's the oddest couple I ever met," said the occupant of the house as she saw them board the car. "They're not engaged, I'm sure. They're not sweet enough to each other. They're more like married people. They haven't much use for each other's opinion. The woman went off to look at the dining room and kitchen without paying any attention to the man, who seemed very impractical for a married man. I wonder if they'll take the house."

The 1st of May came and passed, and the cottage was not taken. On the 2d of June there was a ring at the door-bell and when the occupant opened the door there stood the couple who had looked at the house. But how different in their treatment of each other! The man carried the lady's wrap, stepped aside for her to pass in and was unusually attentive.

"Is this house still in the market?" asked the man.

"Yes."

"We'll take it. When can we get possession?"

"Whenever you wish."

"Very well. You move out Thursday morning, and we'll move in Thursday afternoon."

"But the cleaning, dear," remarked the lady. "That will require two days at least."

"Oh, I forgot. I don't know anything about such things. At any rate, tell the owner to send the lease to my office, and I'll sign. That ends my part."

As they were going away the occupant asked:

"The owner'll want to know the relationship. He never rents to any but those living respectably. I suppose, of course, I can tell him you're married."

"Not yet," replied the lady, with a blush, "but we expect to be as soon as the house is ready for us."
