"THE WHITE MONKEY"
AT PALACE TONIGHT

Each time Charles Ascott, famous animal impersonator is about to play a new role, he visits a zoo to study the particular animal at close range. When he was chosen to delineate the symbolic white monkey in the Sawyer-Lubin picturization of John Galsworthy's novel, "The White Monkey," at the Palace tonight, he went to Central Park, where many fine specimens of monkeydom are caged for amusement, entertainment and education of the populace.

As instancing the high intelligence and sense of humor possessed by members of the monkey tribe, Ascott tells that while watching the two big baboons, the pride of the zoo, he was astonished to see one of them, apparently bored by the inactivity of its mate, who was dozing in the far corner of the cage, suddenly turn a back somersault, swing the trapeze in his leap, and land on top of the sleeping baboon, as if he had fallen from the trapeze by accident. He then sat up and looked at the awakened baboon as if to say that he was sorry, "that it was really quite accidental."

"THE GO GETTER" IS SHOWING, COLISEUM

With T. Roy Barnes, Seena Owen and other well known screen favorites in the cast, "The Go Getter" was presented at the Coliseum last night and is on again tonight, two shows. "The Go Getter" is a comedy drama, filled with good stuff and as the story from which the screen plot is taken was written by the virtue writer, Peter B. Kyne, it is needless to say the production is a splendid one.

There is also a Fox News and Pathe scenic to complete the bill.

MOTION GIVES CAMERA NEW NARRATIVE POWER

HOLLYWOOD, Cal., Dec. 21.—The camera has become one of the most agile performers on the motion picture set since the German influence came to Hollywood.

The old system of planting the feet of the tripod firmly and arranging the players within its limited focal sweep has given way to the ideas of enterprising directors. Scenes are shot from points high and low and from every direction without disturbing the cast arrangement.

The new technique is developed upon the principle that the movies should tell the story in such a manner that the spectator will seem to be witnessing the story without the intermediation of the narrator.

"To accomplish this end the camera must assume many personalities," says Michael Curtiz, director of "The Third Degree," in which the new vogue of unique and unconventional photography was employed. "For the most part it assumes the personality of the audience.

"At moments when the interest is high and the illusion of the audience is greatest, the camera alternately places itself in the position of the various characters, as the dramatic burden shifts from actor to actor. This entails much movement of the camera. If it cuts off at each position so that it seems to jump from place, the effect is noticeable and the reception of the story is marred. In many cases, therefore, the camera must move from position to position without stopping, just as a person would."

NEW INDUSTRY PROMISES MUCH FOR TERRITORY

Reindeer Industry Has Great Future in Alaska, Says Report.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21.—The reindeer industry in Alaska promises to become an important factor in the future development of the Territory, the United States Department of Agriculture. It is comparatively a recent undertaking and as a commercial enterprise dates back only a few years. The original stock of 1,280 animals imported from Siberia about 25 years ago has increased to about 350,000, distributed throughout the Territory in 110 herds.

Industry Growing
The rapidly growing industry requires that scientific studies be made for its best development, and under Congressional authorization such studies were begun by the department in 1920 through the Biological Survey. Improved methods have been recommended to herd owners for handling reindeer and utilizing the range. A study of the range is now being made with a view to inaugurating a permanent system of grazing allotments. Careful and continuous inspection will be required to determine whether an area is being under or overgrazed.

Grazing Important
One of the more fundamental of the problems studied has to do with the relation of lichens to grazing. Some of the results of this study are published in Department Bulletin 1123-D, just issued. Plans for future work contemplate studies chiefly along such lines as the development of interior ranges, conditions governing forage and range management, breed improvement of reindeer, and the control of the diseases and parasites to which the animals are subject. In view of the fact that conditions in Alaska are so different from those in the States as regards the kind of animal under consideration, the nature of the forage, and the climate, it is particularly important that thorough studies be made.

Better Methods Required
Full progress in the reindeer industry can come only from the adoption of better management methods, not only in range control and regulation, but in herd management and provisions for transporting and marketing the meat. "This involves open herding, reduction of the proportion of bulls in the herds, selection of the best stock for breeding, infusion of new blood by cross breeding with native caribou, adoption of improved methods of corralling and branding, keeping sled reindeer in each herd, and providing for herd ownership on the percentage basis for increase, with one registered brand for a community herd.

Copies of the new bulletin may be obtained, as long as the supply lasts, by writing to the United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.
