SEWARD, ALASKA, JULY 14, 1914

AT THE PRESENT time, judging by the dispatches from outside, there seems to be evident a set purpose to discredit President Wilson and his administration. Senator Townsend, whoever he might be, attacks the president on the floor of the senate and William Randolph Hearst gives out an interview in which he severely arraigns the president and his policy and in which he clearly desires to give the impression that the Democrats will be defeated in the congressional elections this year because of dissatisfaction with th present administration.

WOODROW WILSON

All of these attacks should be taken for what they are worth. Never did an administration yet avoid attacks after a year of office and the present administration cannot hope to escape from the bitterness which is invariably engendered by success in the hearts of those whose only claim to notice comes from their readiness to vilify those in power. In the newspaper world it is clearly recognized that attacks are the surest means of drawing attention to the attacker and without a doubt Hearst is now practicing that old trick to save himself from obscurity. Hearst would be nothing if he was not in opposition all the time to someone.

Just now when congressional elections are in sight attacks on the administration may be expected and some of the people and the newspapers will fall for them. It is an old trick in politics to try to make people believe [illegible] need not be surprised to hear now from three to five [illegible] coming elections the administration is sure to receive a [illegible] electors, and the enemies of the administration naturally enough try to bring about that result by attacking the persons who form the administration and particularly, of course, the man who is at the administration's head.

But so far as Alaskans are concerned it would take a lot of Hearsts and a [illegible] of Townsends, whoever he is, to make them believe that President Wilson is not a million times a better man in every sense than all the chronic kickers of all parties put together.
