Friends Meet to Part

Carlton Curtis Goodner

Friends meet to part, and parting leave to memory
Her fairest pictures: just as blooms the rose--
Not half so sweet in all spring's warmth and beauty
As viewed across old winter's fallen snows.
Youth lives too close to life to see it glory;
On hearts so young no warning shadows fall.
Old age alone can see through eyes grown weary
The splendor of the days beyond recall.

But, if the aged heart has learned the lesson
Of fruitless years--of squandered hours of gold,
It, too, has learned the deathless joy of doing.
And all a noble, well-filled life can hold.
Regret nor anguish have no place with duty;
Love knows not a single hate or shame;
Not all the sordid gain of all the ages
For one brief space can match a spotless name.

A few days or a few years spent together--
What matters then that friendship must be brief?
Need thoughts of broken dreams or words of parting
Bring sorrow to a heart, or tears of grief?
Not so. If we but fill our each day's pages
With kindly words, or help some friend to bear
His cross grown heavy, neither time nor trial
Can bring to hearts so filled a single care.

Some day our lessons done, our notes all written,
We'll close the book and lay aside the pen;
And be our pages fair or marred, at closing
'Twill not be ours to write them through again.
So let us strive while lies the road before us--
While hope and love go with us as a friend,
To weave our threads of life in matchless beauty,
And feel no vain regret when comes the end.
