Will strictly attend to all real business entrusted to them. He must not take for his inflexible guide the experiences of other States, nor the practices of the natives, but he must study the situation and master it, and then I am sure he can produce anything that can be raised from the ground elsewhere, requisite to supply all the wants and tastes of the country. Our farmers can not expect to grow rich by sitting in the shade and driving the peons in the sun, nor feast on the fruit of others' toils; but he must, like other professional men, handle the subject for himself, and the more of his personal skill he applies, the more eminent will be his success. He has then the advantage over the miner who grows here as can be desired for family use, and the potato, you know, is a big plumb in the pudding. The agriculturist here has certainly a fine field, but he must be an intelligent and industrious man, who will work out the problem of "abundant and good crops" under the peculiar circumstances existing of soil, climate and water.
