CUNNINGHAM VS. COSTELLO

Old Partnership Matter Brought Before Supreme Court—Claims Amounting To Million Dollars Fought for by Heirs

Just what were the legal relations in partnership of Martin Costello and Paddy Cunningham, two very old-timers in the copper mining district of Cochise county, are being fought out by the two daughters of Cunningham and the widow of Costello. And the amount—being somewhere in the neighborhood of $1,000,000—makes it one of the most interesting cases the supreme court of the state of Arizona has handled in a long time.

In the beginning, Costello and Cunningham had seventeen claims, and the shares that each held in these seventeen claims were never recorded. After Cunningham's death, Costello sold six of the claims, and accounted to the widow for her share of them.

Later, in the superior court of Cochise county, the Cunningham estate was given a right in the proceeds of six more claims, all the remaining eleven having been sold, and Costello having died in the meantime. Both sides appealed, the Costellos because they didn't believe the Cunninghams had any right at all, and the Cunninghams because they claimed they had a right in all of the mines.

Before the supreme court yesterday the case was given its first set of arguments, and, according to the way the testimony is going, the discussion will last several days.

Joseph Scott of Los Angeles, Ellinwood and Ross of Tucson and Ben Goodrich are appearing for Mrs. Costello, while the Misses Cunningham are represented by Eugene S. Ives of Tucson.

PICKPOCKETS BEFORE JUDGE JOHNSTONE

William Bowers and John Watson, the men arrested during fair week for picking the pockets of fair visitors, were before Judge Johnstone yesterday and were held to answer to the superior court, being admitted to bail in the sums of $1000 and $500 respectively.

Thomas Hall, the local fruitgrower, a victim of pickpockets, and his son Richard, testified to the theft of a billfold containing $400 in bills, in Cass Brothers' Chop House, by a man whom he recognized as Bowers. The day after the robbery, the two witnesses conspired themselves detectives, and it was while watching at the entrance of the fair grounds for Bowers, that they saw the two men helping themselves to the contents of other people's pockets on the crowded street cars, and had them arrested. Defendants were unable to furnish the required bond.
