VALUE OF TIME. It is rather a curious sidelight on the character of men of renown that in reading a life of one of them you almost invariably will be struck by the fact that he exemplified the saying, "Those who have most to do and are willing to work, will find the most time." They are all adept at the art of what Bennett calls living on twenty-four hours a day.

It never admits defeat. It is pushing always upward. The life of man is the interesting theme of study. How to protect and extend this life are subjects which the ablest physicians, surgeons and men of medicine are devoting their intelligence and their energies to.

It is one of the direct means of lengthening life. According to the eminent authority, the life of the average man has been prolonged fifteen years. If so much has been accomplished within the last fifty years, what may we not expect within the next fifty? And if this keeps up the biological limit of life will become a common factor in the history of humanity.

Nature's hidden secrets are one by one being discovered. Many yet remain to be found, but science is invincible.
