TOULON TO INVADE U.S.

Mexico's President Paredes Told to Ask Mexico to Join Allied Forces

Washington, March 17—The American intervention in Mexico, in the present problem of national defense, has been urged by Mexico for the first time by its President, Lázaro Cárdenas, as a last chance to prevent its further extension into the western world. The President's announcement that the United States should be prepared to join Allied forces in the event of war has been welcomed by the American Government.

The statement drew immediate attention in Mexico, where the President's remarks were interpreted as a threat. The United States, on the other hand, has been quick to point out that its willingness to join Allied forces in the event of war does not imply any commitment to the Mexican government.

The President's statement has been welcomed by a number of American newspapers, which have noted that the United States has a clear interest in safeguarding its own territory and in preventing the spread of violence into the Western Hemisphere.

The United States has, however, been careful to stress that its willingness to join Allied forces in the event of war is not a commitment to the Mexican government. The United States has long been a strong advocate of the principle of national self-defense, which it believes applies to all nations regardless of their political affiliations.

The United States has also been careful to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its willingness to join Allied forces in the event of war is not a commitment to the Mexican government's policies. The United States has long been opposed to the Mexican government's efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.

The United States has also been quick to point out that its commitment to the defense of Mexican territory is not a commitment to the political system of the Mexican government. The United States has made clear that it will not support the Mexican government in its efforts to suppress political dissent, and it has urged the Mexican government to respect the rights of its citizens.