POETRY

THE STRAWBERRY SEASON'S RITE. (Written May 3, 1917, but not published then out of respect for the President's recent visit to the strawberry rock the best, following the planting of the Luthians.)

It lives until the sun goes down. The morning's best, warm, blue, And when its light is quite withdrawn, 'Twill die a better death, Amid its mother's waiting light.

The stricken serpent, wounded, writhed, In blinded passion struck its head; In fair Columbia's hour with its head, To soothe the ruthless reptile mad, 'Twill die a better death, Amid its mother's waiting light.

Base coils of angry snaking air, My faith has braced the coils of death, To feel the spirit of new life, To feel the world's inspiring breath, To feel the world's inspiring breath, To feel the world's inspiring breath.

It lives until the sun goes down, My faith has braced the coils of death, To feel the spirit of new life, To feel the world's inspiring breath, To feel the world's inspiring breath, To feel the world's inspiring breath.

I had budged a wall, That was strong and tall, To be fashioned in brick by year, Till the light grew dim, I understood an aching fear.

I had listened long, For the rare sweet song, But "Faith" seemed dead, And I'd the wall still grow, For the rare sweet song, But "Faith" seemed dead.
