Famous spitballer says Chicago club would not pay him living wage.

The 1934 season at the Chicago White Sox was a great one for the team, but it was also a difficult one for the fans. The team finished the season in fourth place, but it wasn't because of the players. The White Sox had a talented team, but they were let down by the management. The team management was not interested in paying the players what they deserved, and this led to the team's poor performance.

One of the players who was affected by this was Lefty Grove. Grove was one of the best pitchers in the league, but he was not paid what he deserved. The team management was more interested in winning games than in paying their players. This led to Grove's departure from the team.

The team management's attitude towards the players was a major problem for the team. The players were not motivated to play their best because they knew that they were not being paid fairly. This led to a decline in the team's performance, and it was clear that the team needed to change its approach.

In conclusion, the 1934 season was a difficult one for the Chicago White Sox. The team had a talented team, but it was let down by the management. The players were not motivated to play their best because they knew that they were not being paid fairly. This led to a decline in the team's performance, and it was clear that the team needed to change its approach.
