FIGHT IN N. C.

Raleigh, N. C.—Suffragists here are working to make doubly sure of final ratification of the Anthony amendment in time to give women of the entire nation the vote this fall. While the fight continues in Tennessee, suffrage leaders, headed by Mrs. E. St. Clair Thompson (above) and Mrs. Anne Calvert Neely (below) are working to secure ratification by North Carolina. Only one state is needed.

The signal that a car behind us wished to pass.
"To my surprise—for I knew that if this car was like the others owned by Maj. Grantland there were few in the world which could pass it if its owner wished to keep it ahead, and he usually did so wish—he drew the car to one side of the road, and the closed car which we had seen at the station flew by us.
The officer reduced his speed at once until we were almost crawling. As the car ahead disappeared around one of the curves of the winding road Maj. Grantland spoke tersely:
"Look out for anything coming behind, Graham. I'm going to back."
He threw the big machine into reverse, and with his head turned toward the road behind him began to run the car back as dexterously and most swiftly as he had been guiding it in the other direction. I saw that Dicky was intently watching out of the rear window for any gleam of light which would signal the approach of a car back of us, so I felt reasonably assured that no accident would happen from this most unusual proceeding.

A Lame Excuse
The wildest surmises ran through my brain. Why was Maj. Grantland doing this bizarre and dangerous thing? The only solution which came to me was that he wished to avoid the other car, expected it to turn back and look for him, and wished to present his front lights to it to mislead them in the distance until he could get to another road. But this seemed so far-fetched an explanation that I laughed to myself at myself. But I could think of no other.

We had run back perhaps a quarter of a mile and had rounded three curves when Maj. Grantland said in staccato fashion to Dicky:
"Road swings in at the left, there, eh."
"Yes, right by that big tree," Dicky replied.
"Good." In another second he had pulled the big car around, switched to normal driving again, and we were speeding down another road at a pace which I knew would outdistance anything coming behind us.
"Hope you weren't frightened, Mrs. Graham," Maj. Grantland threw over his shoulder. "I saw I had missed the road, and I always drive backward whenever I can. I might need it sometimes, and it's good practice."
It was the lamest of excuses, but I, of course, had no other course than to pretend to accept it.
"I was not frightened in the least," I said a bit untruthfully, "and I envy you the skill you have just exhibited."
"If you could only make that fiver of yours stand on its hind legs like that, eh, old dear?" Dicky interposed teasingly, but his mother, who I knew had been literally holding her breath during the backward flight, interrupted him:
"If I ever hear of either one of you driving a car like that," she said scathingly, "I'll take Junior away from both of you."
