DEAD OF THE Mainer REST IN THEIR NATIVE LAND.

YESTERDAY was a day of mourning in the Northwest. The news of the loss of the Maine, which had recently been launched, was received with deep sorrow in the Pacific coast ports. The Maine was a war vessel of the United States, and was expected to become a powerful addition to the Navy. The news of her sinking was a great blow to the nation, and was received with universal regret.

The Maine was a war vessel of the United States, and was expected to become a powerful addition to the Navy. The news of her sinking was a great blow to the nation, and was received with universal regret.

The President was quick to express his sympathy, and the Cabinet met to consider the measures necessary to prevent a recurrence of such disasters. The Secretary of the Navy was ordered to investigate the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the Maine, and to make such recommendations as he might deem advisable.

The President also issued a proclamation expressing the nation's grief, and calling for a day of mourning. The public was urged to show their respect for the fallen crew, and to express their sympathy in every way possible.

The news of the sinking was received with a great deal of shock and sorrow, and the citizens of the country were moved to tears by the news. The Maine was a war vessel of the United States, and was expected to become a powerful addition to the Navy. The news of her sinking was a great blow to the nation, and was received with universal regret.