A NARROW ESCAPE

The Close Call of a Burlington Passenger Train.

A Bridge Washed Out Just Before It Cropped.

Seven Minutes Later a Freight Plunged into the Abyss.

The Great Western Union Telegraph Company, which runs 18 passenger trains a day between Fort Wayne and Detroit, had a narrow escape on Tuesday night, when a bridge washed out near between the two cities.

The train was coming from Detroit, making its way through the night. It was about 10 o'clock when the conductor saw a flash of light ahead, and then the train was suddenly thrown into the air. The engine and cars were a mass of wreckage, and the passengers were in great danger.

Fortunately, the bridge had been washed out just before it cropped, and the train was able to make a narrow escape.

The personnel of the train was not injured, and the train was able to continue its journey.
