BRITISH FARMER BEST CULTIVATOR IN WIDE WORLD

The Times of London, March 25—The British agriculturalist who has just won the Duke of Bedford's 2,250 guineas for the best-kept farm in the country is also the man who is making the world take notice of the fact that British agriculture is in a better position now than at any time in its history.

The winner, John Smith, whose farm is located in the heart of the English countryside, has been praised for his use of modern farming techniques and his dedication to sustainable practices. His farm, which is also a model for wildlife conservation, has been visited by farmers from around the world.

Smith's success in the competition is a testament to the hard work and dedication of British farmers who have been at the forefront of agricultural innovation for many years. His farm is a shining example of how modern farming can be both profitable and environmentally responsible.

COMMUNICATION

DANGER. MERE. or 251/2 MAN: have mild, any. Blows GOOD! Deposits. for credited

INTERESTED In THE FUTURE OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE?
In the Great World Crisis in Industry, where is the Place for Future Men? What men have the qualities which will make them leaders in the coming social and industrial upheaval? To answer these questions is the task of the New School for Social Science, New York City. Its aim is to prepare men for leadership in the world's great industrial and social movement.

The New School offers a complete course of study in Social Science, including Economics, History, Sociology, and Political Science. It is a school for those who wish to understand the world in which they live and to take an active part in shaping it.

The New School is open to men and women of all races and creeds. Its motto is: "For the World's Future—For the World's Living—For the World's Understanding."