Editorial Notes.

One of the saddest things in nature is to see a merry, merry maiden on a tare.

He gently whispers to her, on returning from a suspicious absence between the acts, that on account of a cough he has to chew some coffee.

The medical attendant of the Princess Louise says that "it is so"—and Lorne replies: "Yes, I know." Bernhardt would call it "a little accident."

The Zulu lady wears her wedding ring in her nose. A double purpose is thus served. It discourages promiscuous kissing, and she is in little danger of losing her ring. She always nose where it is.

The "Commercial Traveler" will not be presented at this Opera House next week, as announced, owing to the retirement from the troupe of Nelson Decker, who plays a leading character.

We are not obliged to believe everything we hear. Stanley was told at Karagoe of a strange people "who had long ears descending to their feet—one ear formed a mat to sleep on, the others served to cover them from the cold, like a dressed hide."

Much interest has been shown in Florence at the discovery of over six hundred paintings belonging to the masters of the sixteenth century laid away to rot and perish in Government buildings. The authorities intend placing them in the dence or annexation to the United States. They say that there can be no advantageous commercial treaties without independence, or prosperity without treaties, unless by annexation. A newspaper is to be started favoring a marital union with this country. Now, all this comes of Lorne and Louise playing royalty at Rideau House and issuing an order that the Canadian beauties should appear at court bare-necked and almost bare-backed and catch their death in the frigid climate of Ottawa. Such bare-faced nonsense has produced a democratic-republican feeling, although the Canadians are too proud to acknowledge the fact. The little stranger that Louise is to bring over with her from Windsor Castle with a grandmother's blessing, will not soften the indignant admirers of women who have been compelled to dance attendance on bogus royalty half-clad, or be denied admission to the presence of the Campbell and the Guelph. When the baby comes our Canadian friends will be still more nettled, for they will be expected to bow down and kiss its chubby big toe! One can fancy some stalwart Dominionist shouting the words of Edmund Burke in the British Parliament: "I honor, I revere His Majesty, George III., but, sir, I will not bow down to his man-servant, his maid-servant, his ox and his ass!"

Edison must be light-headed. A cat's purr is not on her heel. How much cold can a bear bear? It begins to look as though the red man is "mighty osartin."

A dealer in crystal optics is simply a merchant of eyes in glass.

An orator expects fair sailing when he has before him a sea of upturned faces.

Philadelphia has the bulge on Ohio so in one respect. It is named in the Bible.
