THE LOST COUNTESS

orgy, leaped with yelps upon the story. A young photogenic damsel who had written a best seller was suffering from amnesia and concealed — where? Where was the point. It was hinted that the FBI was on the prowl. The Immigration Department was investigating. The newspapers buzzed.

Lily was, first, gratified at the publicity; then annoyed at the increasing inquisitiveness; finally terrified of the possible embarrassing results.

Though the Contessa had moved from her dreary room to a cheerful little apartment, Lily had kept her well under cover. But now this no longer seemed safe. "We must flee," Lily told her dramatically. "You and I. We must go to the Berkshires. Jason has a house there."

THE Contessa deprecated this hasty move. "Perhaps I should confess that I have perpetrated a hoax," she suggested.

"It was I who perpetrated it," Lily groaned.

The Contessa twinkled. "No no," she said, "you merely advised me that when in New York I should do as the New Yorkers."

"We must admit nothing," said Lily, "until Horace gets back. If only that wretched man would answer my cables!" For Horace seemed to have vanished into the Roman blue.

"We'll drive up tonight," Lily decided. "No one will know. No one will find us. The thing to do," she assured the Contessa, "is to remain entirely calm."

On the following evening, Jason phoned his pearl. "How are you making out?" he asked.

"Fine," said Lily stoutly. They had not opened up the house this summer, and the place, actually, was a mess.

"Did you get old man Semp-hill to turn on the water?" Jason asked.

"Something's wrong with the pump. But we'll get it fixed tomorrow."

JASON gave a mean chuckle, and Lily ground her teeth. Pride had prevented her from confiding to Jason her fears and tremors. When he had asked from time to time, and with maddening masculine superiority, if her publishing venture wasn't getting a little too hot, she had lightly laughed it off. Heartily she wished now that she had never got herself out on such a limb.

"By the way," said Jason, "there's a cable here for you. Shall I read it to you?"

Lily reflected. She didn't want Jason to read it—but on the other hand it must be from Horace, and she had to know what he said.

"Yes, do," she said.

"Hmm — well, this sounds screwy. Listen:

"Something very strange is happening stop You have been deceived by an imposter stop More later.

Horace' I say, Lily, can you add that up?"

"No," said Lily faintly.

"You sound tired," Jason's voice was warm with solicitude. "Sure you're all right?"

"Perfectly splendid," said Lily with determined cheer, "Darling!"
