This Changing World
Shortcomings of U.N. Clearly Shown by China's Case Against Communists
A CHINA-SIEN SHANG-HAI—China's outspoken demand for admission to the United Nations has been met with a surprising contrast.

By Dorothy Thompson

In the famous History of the World, John Bunyan's honest rogue, Mr. Rochester, was asked if he was ready to fight for his king. "I am," he said. "I am ready to risk my life and fortune for my king."

The purpose of this is not to fight for a cause but to forget the past in the present.

As a consequence, the Chinese government is reeling, its economy - already weakened by the long war - is further burdened by the current economic problems. The Chinese people are suffering, their lives and property threatened by the ever-growing violence of the Chinese army. The United Nations, too, is struggling, its reputation endangered by the Chinese government's refusal to accept its responsibility.

This is why the United Nations is in a state of flux, a state of uncertainty. It is a time of change, a time of uncertainty, a time of uncertainty.
