Tout kid was nervous an' he had on uniform and saw he looked like recruit. Except he was wearing a Korean ribbon.

"No onion," he warns me when he orders his hamburger.

"Goin' out to face the enemy?" I kid him.

"Huh?" he says. Then he blushes. "I hope not — she has been writin' real friendly but I been away a long time."

"Pretty, I bet," I say.

"Give a look," he beams at me, pullin' out his wallet to show me his picture.

The gal, judgin' by the snapshot in his wallet, was not goin' to get into the movies. But she was young an' eager.

"Beautiful," I say, solemnly, just like I was one of the judges at Atlantic City. A little oriental gold locket falls out of the wallet onto the counter.

The boy picks it up an' blushes.

"Think she will like it? he asks, anxious-like. "I bought it in Tokyo."

"Like it?" I say. "Son, do you realize what you got there? That is a mystic charm locket of the Orient. Whoever gives it to somebody else brings luck to himself and the other party at the same time."

"You act like you know jewelry," he says.

"Know jewelry?" I side-step. "I can tell you somethin' more. When you get ready to give it to her, take one end of the chain in each hand. Reach around her neck an' bring the ends together. Then look over her left ear so you can see to fasten the catch. Snap it quick, because, son, you'll be goin' to need both hands free from them on!"

"Gosh!" he says, beginnin' to tremble. "I've kind of lost my appetite — I don't think I want that hamburger."

"Here," I say to him, stern as a sergeant, "you better eat it. A man gets light-headed on an empty stomach, an' while presentin' an oriental necklace to a beautiful woman is no time for a man to faint!"
