The Election in the City. As a general thing the voting commenced early, and continued without disturbance throughout the day. The weather was very fine, and the number of respectable citizens at the polls unusually large.

The City on Election Night. The trial accompaniments of election day—rain, snow, fog—were missing yesterday. The day was clear and bright, and there was every opportunity for a full vote.

Republican Headquarters. The spacious hall of the Republican headquarters, corner of Broadway and Twenty-third street, was brilliantly lighted, at an early hour, and in a short time was densely crowded with a patriotic and excited throng.

Democratic Headquarters. The headquarters of the Democratic party was crowded by a very jubilant body of the members of this wing of the government. In the rear part of the evening, Mr. Gilbert Dean informed the audience that the victory which the Democracy had achieved in this city had abolished Fort Lafayette.

Speech of James Brooks to his supporters. The friends of Mr. Brooks in the VIIIth District met in the hall, No. 532 Broadway, last evening, and listened to the following speech from the Congressional elector in this quarter.

Mr. Spencer continued, that if they were to make a funeral of the present occasion, it would be a good idea to have an Irish wake, and have a jolly time of it. Somebody called out for a song.

Mr. Spencer—Is James Gordon Bennett here? The answer was given by the audience in a number of groans, rivaling in power a small earthquake.
