And that year Tang and her captain, Dick O'Kane, achieved the most outstanding record of damage and destruction to enemy shipping ever credited to one submarine. Here Tang was photographed as she returned to Pearl Harbor in April, 1944, after having rescued 22 carrier-based pilots whose planes had been forced down at sea during an attack on the Japanese island-

"FIRE!" Even before the second fish of this three-torpedo salvo is on its way, O'Kane turns back to the gunboat, just in time to see him charge across the stern at full speed. Evidently he had misjudged the sub's direction of motion, which is a lucky break. Another minute free, at least.

In the meantime, as soon as the last torpedo is fired, the word is passed through the ship: "Rig for depth charge!"

these two characters, but at about 1500 the motorboat, by great good luck, sighted the periscope of the questing submarine, and tailed her from then on.

Not good, this, but Tang is not one to give up just because a little boat latches on to her.

Shortly before 1700 smoke is sighted. Tank starts the approach, and the smoke resolves itself into two heavily laden ships, escorted by the gunboat and another escort. Both ships are running as close to the beach as they dare, and Tang goes right on in after them, followed by the ubiquitous motorboat.

The approach develops normally, and it is not long before OKane finds himself just where he wants to be, broad on the leading target's beam, ready to shoot. Just then there is an excited report from the sound man.
