Germany Confesses in a Secret Record
Her Turkish Partner’s Crimes in Armenia

The truth about the partial extradition of the Armenian nation held for the time by Great Britain, the German government as part of a secret agreement with the Young Turks and their allies, the Armenian Mission, is revealed in a secret document. The document was discovered by British authorities in the course of an investigation into the Armenian deportations. It details the complicity of the German government in the Armenian genocide, which took place in the Ottoman Empire during World War I. The document was signed by Dr. Eugene Baugher, a high-ranking official in the German government, and was written in 1916.

The document contains detailed information about the deportations of Armenians from Ottoman Empire to German-occupied territories, which were part of the German government's strategy to obtain territory and resources. The deportations were carried out by the Ottoman authorities under the pretext of fighting a rebellion, but were actually part of a planned genocide.

The document also reveals the involvement of the German military in the deportations, as well as the complicity of the British government in the operation. It is a shocking reminder of the extent of the crimes committed during World War I and the role of the German government in those crimes.
