Believes Collapse Of Interest Rates Would Be Menace

A collapse of interest rates which would encourage the permanent maintenance of the great body of bank loans now outstanding is undesirable for many reasons, according to George E. Roberts, vice-president of the National City Bank, who discusses the future of interest rates at some length in the Acceptance Bulletin of the American Acceptance Council.

"The policy of the Federal Reserve authorities," the banker declares, "may be expected to adhere persistently to the purpose of deflating the reserve banks and bringing their condition down to what it would be in view of their responsibilities as the custodians of the final reserves of the country. That would mean with reserves fluctuating normally around 75 per cent. The rates probably will be reduced before that position is reached, but the Reserve banks are likely to follow the member banks in reductions rather than lead them. They will want the member banks to get on their own footing.

"As liquidation proceeds the banks which are not rediscounting, of whom there are many, will be first to compete for open market business, and as rates decline the houses which have been accustomed to find supplies in the general market will resort to it and pay down their borrowings with their own banks, which will stimulate the latter to get out of the Reserve banks, thus lowering the whole volume of bank loans.

"At this point we shall see the final effects of the policy of lowering the legal reserve requirements. Undoubtedly we are going to run with lower reserves than in the years before the war. The law has been changed to permit it, and we have become accustomed to rely upon the Reserve banks. But the effect is going to be to give us low interest rates long before complete deflation, by the standard of former normal conditions, is reached. Of a total increase in loans of $10,250,265,747 in the individual banks from June 30, 1917, to June 30, 1920, only $2,777,083,000 was passed on to the Reserve banks, and if they were all paid off the major portion of the inflation would remain, unless the necessity of applying to the Reserve banks for currency would bring the local banks under the influence of its rate-making authority. An inflation of credit, carrying with it an inflation of prices and wages, is bound to create a demand for more currency, and currency can be had only from the Reserve banks. That seems to be the one grip which the Reserve authorities have on the general credit situation. It is the one influence that will tend to maintain the pressure for deflation and in that manner prevent a rapid collapse of interest rates, for it may be assumed that the authorities will endeavor to stabilize rates, rather than have them fall unduly low.
