

In the War Zone

This poor little "orphan" was rescued from the recesses of a ruined chateau by the British in their advance and has become the pet of a big gun crew. Timidity is not in this kitten's make-up, as it is quite willing to pose on a giant shell.

(British Official Photograph.)
(From Central News Photo Service.)

Maj. Gen. Sir C. H. Powell, K. C. B., head of the British Red Cross, en route to Siberia. He will inspect conditions among the troops there.

(Copyright by International Film Service.)

Camouflaged wireless truck at the front. The rapid progress now being made by the American troops would, but for the wireless, make it impossible for the troops to remain in communication with headquarters.

(Copyright by Committee on Public Information. From Central News Photo Service.)

Some of the reasons Germany asked for an armistice. Almost 5,000 guns of all calibers have been taken by the allies since July 18, the climax coming with the capture of Cambrai. These German guns, which have fired their last shell for "kultur," were taken on the Cambrai front.

(British Official Photograph. From Central News Photo Service.)

Bedraggled little Serbian refugees find a happy refuge in England. They were welcomed after their long journey at the Waterloo station, London, by Sir Charles Wakefield and the wife of the Serbian minister.

(Copyright by Underwood & Underwood.)

"Whoop 'er up, fellows! Let's show 'em some Yankee pep!" Always the same carefree, happy-go-lucky spirit prevails among the American boys, whether in war or peace, at home or abroad. In this photo American soldiers are "cutting-up" in Hyde Park, London.

(Copyright by Underwood & Underwood.)