WHEN TEUTON MEETS BRITON ON THE HIGH SEAS

I t is certain particularly, "To him that hath shall be given." Before the war Great Britain had a merchant marine larger computed at 32,000,000 gross tons. Germany had only 4,000,000 tons. But this Germany has suffered the almony complete loss of her merchant marine. Even include those ships of her sold foreign ports. But Great Britain, despite the activity of Von Tirpitz's admirals and the shipyard of Tramontana, has materially increased her tonnage, none of the work which can arrive the Kaiserliche's mustache.

The war has not only deprived the Germany's merchant marine, but the British have captured many German ships. The Germans, in turn, have seized British ships. The British have captured a number of German ships, including the Hamburg, a large merchant vessel. The Germans have seized a British battleship, the Prince of Wales. The British have captured a German cruiser, the Scharnhorst. The Germans have seized a British steamer, the Iolaire. The British have captured a German submarine, the U-boat.

The war has been a war of attrition, a war of numbers. The British have a larger merchant marine than the Germans. They have a larger fleet of warships. The Germans have a larger fleet of submarines. The British have a larger fleet of destroyers. The Germans have a larger fleet of battleships. The British have a larger fleet of cruisers. The Germans have a larger fleet of destroyers. The British have a larger fleet of submarines.

The war has been a war of numbers, a war of attrition. The British have a larger merchant marine than the Germans. They have a larger fleet of warships. The Germans have a larger fleet of submarines. The British have a larger fleet of destroyers. The Germans have a larger fleet of battleships. The British have a larger fleet of cruisers. The Germans have a larger fleet of destroyers. The British have a larger fleet of submarines.