President Jackson's Views on the Moral Relations of the Union to the Foreign Peace.

BY W. S. CURTIS

W. S. CURTIS, Washington, D.C.

The fascinating aspect of the current moral relations between the United States and the foreign peace is the fact that President Jackson, in his address to Congress, has so clearly stated the necessity for peace, as a means of national strength and prosperity. His views are truly inspiring, and we feel that the people of the world should heed them. The President's words are:

"There is no greater need in the world to-day than the establishment of peace. The only way to do this is to secure peace in the foreign peace, and this can only be accomplished by maintaining our own peace and establishing peace in the foreign peace."

FEMALE AMNESTY

A Tough Effort in the Making of a Strong British Deserter.

There are thousands of British deserters in India, and for many years the British government has been trying to apprehend them. They have been using every possible means to catch these deserters, but so far without success. The British government has decided to try a new method, and has offered a reward of one hundred thousand dollars for the apprehension of any British deserter who has been in the service of the British government for more than a year.
