Royalty walked bareheaded through the streets of Vienna in the funeral cortege of the Emperor Francis Joseph. The monarch's son, Charles Francis Joseph, who succeeded him, is beside his daughter, who holds the hand of Zita, the new Empress, in heavy mourning. In the group behind them are King Ludwig of Bavaria, King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, the Crown Prince of Sweden, the Crown Prince of Germany and the King of Norway.

"Our machine guns," says the official report, "repulsed the enemy's attacks." The machine gun, or "rattler," as the soldiers know it, works very much like a scythe. Properly placed and manned, it simply mows down attackers. Three hundred Russians, of which this picture shows a part, gave up their lives in an effort to take a Teuton east front trench, and failed because the storm of lead cut them down in rows.
