Clergymen as Scientific men.
Not the least interesting feature in the discussion about the theory of evolution is the prominent part taken by it by clergymen of various denominations. There is hardly one who, since Huxley's lectures, has not proached a sermon bearing on the matter in some way, and several have made it the topic of special articles or lectures. One minister in Boston, Mr. Cook, has delivered two or three lectures on it, and Dr. Taylor, in New York, has lately taken the same position in a letter to the Tribune. Other ministers have attacked the hypothesis in the religious questioner. In fact, we do not think we exaggerate when we say that three-fourths of all that has been recently said or written about it in this country, has been by the Christian world for several centuries. It would, therefore, be no more surprising that ministers should meet it, either by showing that the Mosaic account of the Creation was really inspired—was in short, the account given by the Holy Spirit—or that the modern interpretations of it were incorrect, and that it was really, when properly understood, easily reconciled with the conclusions reached of late years by geologists and biologists. This is the way in which a great many ministers have hitherto met the theory of evolution, and the modern interpretations of it were incorrect, and that it was really, when properly understood, easily reconciled with the conclusions reached of late years by geologists and biologists.

Russia in Central Asia.
Within the last fourteen years, chiefly within the last eight, Russia has added in Central Asia a territory larger than that of France and Germany combined, over 450,000 square miles, containing a population of 3,000,000, to her vast Empire. The Russian seat in this new conquest is the city of Tashkent, a fine city, long and wide, built on a high, fertile plain, and a few miles from the sea.
