The Venice Campanile. General Mourning Throughout the World Caused by Its Fall.

If you can imagine thousands of grown men and women in tears at the collapse of a pile of brick and mortar, when not a single human life was sacrificed in the ruin, you can form some idea of the sadness following the news of the falling of the Campanile of San Marco. No human catastrophe that I have ever known has spread a wider wave of acute grief. In London at the clubs, in the homes, on the streets, in fact, everywhere, it was impossible to escape discussion of the fall of the tower, or fail to observe the tone of universal grief. It was only a pile of brick and cement placed in an awkward position among a group of famous buildings. Most of those who saw it for the first time bringing with them preconceived ideas of regularity and primness, quarreled with the builders and architects of the tenth century because they had perpetrated such an abortion in the midst of such architectural loveliness as surrounded it. Yet these very critics were forced to give expression to their sorrow when the telegraph spread the news over the world that the famous monstrosity had fallen into a shapeless ruin.

Hopkinson Smith, in his "Gondola Days," pays an artistic tribute to the great Campanile in glowing terms. So have Ruskin and thousands among artists in published expressions. Added to these aesthetic expert, many millions of lay travelers have written their impressions in personal letters. A multiplicity of pictures, in every medium, from the earliest drawings to the latest masterpieces of photography, hung on tens of thousands of walls, have spread the fame of the giant steeple and its distinguished life of a thousand years.

The telegraph reports tell us that thousands of mourners surrounded the shapeless pile of what had been a curiosity of art, and cried like children. It must have been so, for in the moment of disaster who could refrain from sadness at so great a calamity? Beauty upon beauty remained in the splendid cathedral, in the stately palace of the Doges, in the famous library of Sansovino, in the peristyle that Napoleon added to the group to bring the Procuratie and the royal palace together in an harmonious quadrangle. But the spire that led these marvelous creations of a thousand years from their base in the mud of the lagoons up toward the Infinite Blue, like the stem which bears the majesty of a lotus flower, had testified to its modest majesty by its disappearance.

The fallen giant was forty-two feet square upon its foundations, and rose to the height of three hundred and twenty-five feet. It was a shabby affair in its minute detail; it had been desecrated by coatings of plaster; the salty quality in the mortar that had been used from time to time to "point" its crevices had thrown out saline stains, further defacing its surfaces; its bulky form was ungraceful by common ideals, and yet there nev-

The First Local Mint.

One of the institutions here which has the special attention of tourists as well as the local people is the Mint, which is established on Nuuanu street, opposite Queen Emma Hall. It is interesting to enter the large main working room where general manager McDonough and his corps of assistants are at work. The cool and large lanai is a proper resting place and the vaults, where the "bars" to be minted and beer are kept present a very tasty spectacle. The Mint is open from 5:30 a. m. to 11:30 p. m. and during those hours the work never ceases. Visitors after looking over the place will find first class refreshments and the purest of liquors.
