LOVED HIS SHIP BEST

Count Festetics' Wife Had a Sad Life.

HER STORY TOLD IN COURT

Real Troubles Began in Honolulu Where the Yacht's Crew Deserted.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 15.—"Toina ahoy! 'Ahoy, Oceania. Au revoir, Ella. Bon voyage.'" Thus did the ships upon which sailed Rudolph and Ella, Count and Countess Festetics de Tolna, pass in the night. The Oceania went down to the sea and behind her the darkness closed round the little yacht Tolna at anchor in the Straits of Malacca. Ella, Countess Festetics de Tolna, was coming home to launch her action for divorce against her titled and characteristically negligent husband. He remained behind to breathe his bit of the salt air of the ocean, to fight and quarrel with his black-skinned crew and to grow restless with the annoyances of the "cockroaches and creepers" that Lillian Ross Thomson of Hongkong avers infested Count Festetics' fulfilled his end of the bill until the bones of the Tolna sank beneath the sea. Countess Festetics launched her divorce proceedings. They were heard by Judge Bahrs yesterday and the action was submitted for decision.

Mr. Lowey protested against the action of the court in taking the case under advisement until such time as Count Festetics' deposition, arrived from Vienna. E. S. Pillsbury, counsel for Countess Festetics, swept aside the necessity of a deposition by Count Festetics by admitting that the Austrian Count would deny everything asserted by Countess Festetics and corroborated witnesses, and would reaffirm every allegation made in his answer to his wife's divorce complaint. Under the statute there was no alternative but for the court to take the case under advisement, but Judge Bahrs stated, however, if Count Festetics' deposition arrived in the future, he would consider the same in his deliberations on the merits of the plaintiff's case. Countess Festetics entered the courtroom accompanied by Mr. Pillsbury, Miss Elizabeth Hooper, her cousin, who resides at St. Helena, Lieutenant Francis Brooks Upham of the Pensacola and another gentleman friend. She was dressed in a black tailor-made gown relieved with white, and wore a fetching black chiffon turban.

Countess Festetics was immediately called to the stand by Mr. Pillsbury. She immediately addressed the court and began to tell the story of her sufferings aboard the Tolna during her five years at sea, the details of which have been heretofore published. Referring to the many trials and tribulations of her own voyage, Countess Festetics said her real troubles began at Honolulu.

"At Honolulu," she said, "the captain and crew of the Tolna deserted and after we had secured a new crew I was compelled to take the post of sailing master. We went from Honolulu to Tahiti, visiting all of the islands of the South Seas, and thence we went to Sydney. From the time we left Sydney I began to complain of my sufferings aboard the Tolna. I was broken in health, my nervous system was a wreck and I felt that if I did not die I would go crazy. My pleadings to my husband to either resign or to let me go and for three more years I was forced to comply with his wishes.

"During the trip we visited Kobe and there found a message informing me that my mother was seriously ill. I immediately took a steamer for home, and did not join my husband again until early in May, 1900, when he was then at Honolulu with the Tolna. Against my objection, for I was in poor health, we set sail for Manila. The crew was made up of Malays, Filipinos and Lascars, while the captain was an Austrian. In addition to my fear of the crew and the elements, I was forced to endure either the yachting or the land. When we reached Manila we found that Admiral Dewey had destroyed the Spanish flotilla, and as things were still in a dangerous condition he ordered the yacht away. We went, but my husband insisted on visiting the other islands of the Philippine archipelago. Though we were in constant danger we cruised around and among the islands, but finally, without injury, we made our way to Sandakan, in Borneo, where we arrived in August of 1898.

"We cruised around and finally arrived at Singapore. The physician ordered me to the mountains for my health. Count Festetics would have none of it. He said the yacht was good enough for me and that I was not as sick as I thought I was. At last, in despair that I would lose either my mind or my life, I went ashore and he sailed away, leaving me penniless at Singapore. I telegraphed home for money. My father responded promptly and I took the steamer for home.

"I last saw the Count in the Straits of Malacca. The Oceania, in which I sailed, passed either my mind or my life, I went ashore and he sailed away, leaving me penniless at Singapore. I telegraphed home for money. My father responded promptly and I took the steamer for home.

would look foolish to run two bills as he suggested. He finally consented that we should run joint accounts, but insisted that I pay my proportion of the expenses. Thus I was forced to pay for all things purchased by me."

Here the Countess presented a bill to bear out her assertion. Opposite each item purchased by her there appeared a "tick," while items purchased for his use bore a cross. One bill, which was read in evidence and then pocketed by counsel, reads something like the following: Cheese, for the Count, 28 cents. Hat, for the Countess, $16. Crystallized fruit, for the Countess, $2. Mustard, for the Count, $1. Coffee, for the Count, 60 cents. Cruet, for the Countess, $12, and cap for the Count, $2.

"The items on the bills," continued Countess Festetics, "were segregated, and all purchased by me were paid by me, and Count Festetics footed his portion of the bill. Though the cruet and a silver napkin ring I purchased were for use on the yacht, I was forced to pay for the same, just because I fancied them and suggested that they were needed."

A letter from Count Festetics to his wife was introduced in evidence. In this missive the Countess thus concluded her story, and her cousin, Miss Hooper, was called to the stand. Miss Hooper simply testified that Countess Festetics was in poor health when she started on her trip with her husband in the Tolna in 1893. Lieutenant Brooks followed Miss Hooper to the stand. He stated that he and Countess Festetics at Honolulu, again at Yokohama and again at Hongkong. At Hongkong he said many naval officers agreed with him that the yacht was fit only for coast trips.

Countess Festetics' case was closed with the deposition of Lillian Ross Thomson. In her deposition the witness testified that she visited the vessel. "I was dirty and unkempt," she said, "and in the cabin there were creepers and cockroaches," but she and other visitors were too polite to remark about the peculiar conditions they found. Count Festetics was "surly, impolite and disagreeable." He never went near his wife unless she called him and that was seldom. He neglected her and treated her cruelly and unjustly so.

Such is the story of the life of an Austrian Count with an American girl for a wife. Countess Festetics is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Louis T. Haggin of New York and a granddaughter of the late J. B. Haggin, the noted millionaire. The Count is the second son of Count Sigismund Festetics, once Chamberlain of the Austrian court, and was formerly a second lieutenant in the Austrian army. A brilliant social life awaited them, but his love for the sea and for adventure was greater than his love for his wife.

Capt. George D. Coffey, of Chicago, is dead. He was a Mississippi planter owning large estates in the South before the war. When a prisoner on a federal gunboat he planned and almost accomplished the escape of Confederate prisoners and the capture of the boat.
