PROPRIETORS DAILY HONOLULU PRESS

ABOUT CABINET HOMES.

DOMESTIC LIFE IN WASHINGTON.

When and to whom the Presidential Advisors and their families are "at home"—The Family Arrangements of the Secretaries.

[Washington Cor. St. Louis Post-Dispatch.]

Notwithstanding the hot wave which has been recently hovering over the country, particularly Washington, the preparations for the return of society to its home and its normal condition goes steadily forward. Though the residence portion of the city there are signs of renewed activity. Residences that have been closed begin to look alive again. Along the avenues and the principal streets, where are residences of Cabinet officers, Senators, and people prominent in the social and political world, there are to be seen evidences of returning vitality. Carpets that have been in retirement the summer months now make their appearance inside yards, and the sound of the tack-hammer is heard by the passer-by. Costly hangings which had been wrapped and protected from moisture during the long summer months are being brought forth from their places of concealment and put into position again. The lawns which had been somewhat neglected by careless servants left in charge, are being brushed up and newly watered. The little white tents which in the earlier part of the season decorated so many of the lawns surrounding residences and gave a charming effect to the already beautiful city will soon appear again. The lawn tennis net is again making its appearance, and the external evidences of the return of society are everywhere to be seen. In the full which precedes the beginning of an active social season, it may be interesting to not a few to know something of the home life of the members of the Cabinet. Of the seven members of the Cabinet, Secretary Folger, whose death is universally mourned, had less of a "home," perhaps, than any of the others. He was a widower. His two daughters were in extremely delicate health, and found themselves unable to withstand the rigors of Washington. They spent a portion of the winter and spring here, but only a portion, and the consequence was that Secretary Folger's residence, although he kept up the formalities and appearances of the home, had less of the genuine attractions which the work carries in its fullest sense than does any other Cabinet officer. It could not otherwise. With neither wife nor children to brighten the home, it was not expected that it could compare with those of his fellow-Cabinet officers, who were surrounded by their families. His residence was always a formal and handsome one; comfortably though not luxuriously furnished, and his friends were always welcomed to it. Telephonic connection with his office, with the telegraph offices of the city and the White House and other Cabinet officials, made him accessible at all hours of the day and night. He was on duty, but in many cases their labor begins before that hour, and in almost all cases continues at their homes later than four o'clock. Secretary Folger's parlor was often his office, strewn with papers and evidences of his devotion to the duties of his position. It often saw him at work far into the small hours. His private secretary occupied rooms at his house and was in fact a member of his family, so far as home life was concerned. Secretary Frelinghuysen's home is on I street, not far from the State Department. It occupies a house which would not attract special attention by its exterior elegance. It is a plain, brick double house, with parlors on either side of a broad hall. At the right, as you enter, is a small reception-room, and the left is a large dining-room. At the left is the parlor, properly very handsomely fitted up with furniture and hangings in rich, warm colors. Another—smaller hall—runs through the center of the house at right angles to the one at which you enter, and across this is the dining-room. Here tea and lunch are served on almost all occasions when the doors of the Secretary's residence are opened to the friends of the family, which is very often. Probably no member of the Cabinet entertains so frequently as the Secretary of State. His wife and oldest daughter usually receive the visitors in the parlor, after they have laid aside their wraps in another room, while a younger daughter presides in the dining-room. In the front room, immediately over the hall, on the second story, stands a large, handsome desk, similar to those seen in well-furnished offices. On the wall of the room is a telephone. Near by is a desk occupied by the private secretary, and here the Secretary of State transacts not a little of his important business. Often he is at his desk late at night, and much of the most important work is done here rather than at his office in the State Department, where he must often be disturbed by calls of diplomats and members of Congress. Secretary Chandler's home, which is also on I street, a few blocks from Secretary Frelinghuysen's, is rather more pretentious in appearance than that of the Secretary of State. It is a handsome building, with a front of pressed brick and a few spots of stained glass in the windows and transoms. A broad hallway runs through the center, reaching stairs in the smaller hall, which runs at right angles with the entrance hall. The first floor arrangements are very much like that of Secretary Frelinghuysen's residence, just described. Mr. Chandler does not give as many entertainments as does the Secretary of State. Of course Mrs. Chandler receives on reception days, as do all the wives of Cabinet officers, but aside from this, a few dozen evening receptions will probably cover the extent of the social features of Secretary Chandler's home. Mr. Chandler does probably more work at his home than does Secretary Frelinghuysen. He gives a good deal of attention to politics and not a little to his private business, and is, on the whole, probably the busiest man in the entire Cabinet. He has his desk on the second floor of his residence, and works early and late. Postmaster-General Gresham lives a few doors from Mr. Chandler. His residence is scarcely as large or handsome as that of the Secretary of the Navy. There are parlors at the left as you enter, tastefully furnished, and in the rear of those parlors, on the first floor, is Mr. Gresham's office, where he gives considerable time to business outside of office hours. Secretary Lincoln occupies a handsome house on Massachusetts avenue, near Thomas Circle, tastefully furnished, not elegantly, furnished. His wife has, owing to a variety of painful circumstances, entertained very little during his term in the Cabinet, and, of course, will be prevented from further entertainments by the recent death of her mother, Mrs. Lincoln. The residence of Attorney-General Brewster, on Connecticut avenue, is one of the handsomest of the Cabinet officers' homes. It is not only tastefully, but luxuriously, furnished and fitted. In general arrangement it is very similar to those of Secretaries Frelinghuysen and Chandler. A large and well-filled library is at the left of the entrance, an elegantly-furnished parlor on the right, and the dining-room is at the end of the main hall, and just across another hall which runs at right angles with the entrance. The furniture and hangings are especially fine, and in excellent taste, for not only is the Attorney himself devoted to this sort of thing, but he is aided by the excellent judgment of his wife and by his ample fortune.

SIGNOR BRUMIDI.
The Artistic Italian Who Labored on the White House.

[Washington Cor. Cleveland Leader.]

During those hot days the Capitol building is the coolest place in Washington. Its deep stone walls are so thick that the heat can hardly penetrate to them, and delightful drafts whistle about through its corridors, while the rest of the city is roasting in sweltering heat. Standing as it does three hundred feet above the Potomac, the Capitol is favored with breezes which are denied the Treasury and the White House. I spent a very pleasant hour in wandering about through it yesterday, and I find that many improvements have been made since the sitting of the last Congress. The whole of the front of the main building facing the naked statue of Washington has been covered with a heavy coat of cream white paint, and the painters are now at work on the interior of the Senate side. I stopped a moment and chatted with one of them. He was a short, pleasant-faced German of about 60, who has for many years been one of the painters of the Capitol. He told me some curious things about it.

Said he: "There are eleven painters engaged in painting at the Capitol to-day, and more than that number are kept constantly busy. Painters get $3 a day in wages, and they get $2 for all kinds of material. They are not paid for all. I suppose to paint this building throughout would cost a good deal over $100,000. It would take tons of paint. The coats of white lead which have been put on the outside of the central structure make its paint over half an inch thick. It has been painted only once since it was built, and layer after layer of white lead has been spread one upon the other. Most of the fine work here was done by Brumidi, and I used to work under his direction."

"What kind of a fellow was Brumidi?" I asked. "He was an Italian, and a very good painter indeed. He made a great deal of money, but he spent it very rapidly, and he was often hard up. You ask what kind of a man he was. Well, I can tell you by giving you an instance of his kindness to me. One day, when he was pretty well down at the wheel, he sent for a few pawbrokers to come and look at a gold watch he wished to sell. It was an beautiful lady's watch, made in the old country, elegantly finished, and worth, I suppose, more than $100. The Jew, a sort of a Sisylock, came while I was present, and offered him $40 for it. Mr. Brumidi wanted $80. The Jew would not give it, and Mr. Brumidi sent him away. After he had gone I said: 'Mr. Brumidi, why do you sell that watch? If it were mine I would never part with it.' 'Why, poor as I am, I would give $10 for it as a present to my daughter.'"

"What, you want to be repaid Mr. Brumidi. Then you shall have it, and I will give it to you for $10,' and he did, though the Jew had just offered him $40 for it."

Sig. Brumidi died a few years ago. He was born in Rome in 1806, and came to America at the age of forty-six, during the administration of President Fillmore. His wife, whom he married late in life, was about thirty years younger than he, and she is, I understand, now living in Rome in very reduced circumstances. Mr. Brumidi received a nice little fortune for the work he did about the Capitol. For his work in other parts of the building he was paid proportionately well, but he was a fine artist, and his labor is among the cheapest in the capital building.

MY OWN MORTGAGEE.

Why, really, you frighten but please me, I feel like a babe in love's hand; Nay, sir, do not offer to squeeze me, 'Tis more than decorum can stand.

How often my pupils I've taught
From penless lovers to flee,
But I never once cherished the thought
Of wedding my own mortgagee.

Since fancy my horseshoe cast,
I've stored all its dreams on my shelf,
And now that my green days are past,
What pleasure to husband myself!

Yes, really, you frighten but please me,
Twice happy our marriage will be,
For then you'll both bind and release me,
My darling, my own mortgagee!
