TOO FEW ARTISTIC ROADSIDES
In That Respect It Must Be Admitted That the United States Is Far Behind Europe.
The advantage and pleasure to be derived from an artistic roadside seem so apparent that it would appear unnecessary to comment on the matter, but when we travel about and see our highways with their bordering improvements we are forced to the conclusion that the appearances are not sufficiently appreciated.
Streets of the usual box-type of clapboard houses may be found in and about most of our cities. That they are devoid of any artistic conception is particularly proved when we contrast them with the roadsides which may be seen in charming variety throughout the most progressive European countries.
The awkward boxlike type shows a lack of thought beyond merely filling out the physical requirements, whereas the European type shows a graceful treatment of the roof lines and grouping of the chimneys.
In countries where the general surroundings are so artistic it becomes the natural habit to follow the prevalent examples, so that the idea when once started has a natural growth.
Architectural design may be artistically and economically applied to all classes of buildings, notwithstanding the general opinion that such thought is only applicable to expensive construction. When we arrive at a proper appreciation of the artistic roadside we will not hesitate to insist on architectural treatment of all construction work of whatever class.
Speed Up Good Roads.
"Speeding up construction of good roads is an integral part of government war work. Efficient transportation is necessary to reduce the margin between producer and consumer."
—United States Food Administration.
Federal Aid for Roads.
The theory that federal-aid road construction will not be sanctioned during the war has been exploded by the fact that the government has fixed the price of cement for this work.

EASILY MADE RUSTIC SEAT
Limb of Felled Tree Quickly Converted into Useful and Ornamental Addition to Yard.
It was merely as a matter of convenience that the largest limb of a tree which was felled, was sawed off nearer the ground than were the two smaller branches. However, this at once suggested a seat, which was very easily made. A piece of board was placed on the large stump and a simple back made of cross poles with vertical slats nailed to them, was fastened between the two smaller limbs. With the bark removed and the surface coated with a dull green paint the seat harmonizes with the surroundings.—Popular Science Monthly.
Shape of This Tree Made Simple Task to Construct a Seat From Its Stump.
Puddle Around Watering Place Is Disagreeable to Sight and Smell—Also Breeds Flies.
There is no need to run so much water into the watering trough that it slops over and forms a puddle all about the trough. Under the constant tramping of animals it is not long before the surroundings assume the consistency of thin porridge. This is not only disagreeable to sight and smell but it shows slight consideration for sanitation. Flies in large numbers are to be seen about such a place. A few hours later they may be inspecting the food on one's table. Be it remembered that liquid filth is always a source of more danger to human health than where it is bone dry.
Feed Little Pigs Separately.
As soon as the pigs will eat, which is usually at four or five weeks of age, they should be fed separately from their dam.
