THE STRANGE CASE OF MILES O'BRIEN.

[Original.]
I shall be accused of hunting through old fashioned dime novels for a plan for this story unless I state that it is true. The names of the characters are not their real ones, but the incidents are exactly as they occurred in all their improbability.

"The O'Briens," said a man standing in his doorway, "are quarrelling. Listen!"

A man's voice was heard to say: "Be quiet, Molly. Don't you see the neighbors looking?"

"I don't care if they are. This life I'm living with you is unbearable."

"Very well, I'll trouble you no longer. But remember—mind what I say (he shook his finger at her)—you'll not get me back for the asking."

O'Brien strode away, and his wife went into the house and slammed the door. Those who were watching the couple went off about their respective callings and thought no more of the incident, except that this was the first time they had ever known the couple to quarrel. Miles and Molly O'Brien had been supposed to be devoted to each other.

The next day and the next and the next the O'Brien house was closed. Neither Miles nor his wife was at home, nor was either seen in the village. Then one morning a crowd gathered about their house. In the yard lay Mrs. O'Brien, dressed in her best clothes and wearing ornaments which she seldom wore except on gala occasions. She had been dead some time. A blow on the head had been the cause of her death. The body was identified before the coroner, the parting words of the couple given in evidence, and the police of neighboring cities were notified to arrest Miles O'Brien for the murder of his wife. The same evening he was lodged in jail.

The trial was one of circumstantial evidence. The couple had quarreled, O'Brien had gone to the city, where during the interval between his leaving home and his arrest he had shunned every one. His wife had disappeared. Then suddenly she had been found in her own yard murdered, wearing her best apparel and her jewelry. The theory of the prosecution was that she had returned to her home for the purpose of taking away these valuables, that her husband had found her there, they had renewed their quarrel and O'Brien had killed her.

The prisoner's counsel tried in vain to discover the exact time of the murder in order to establish an alibi, but the corpse had been found in the morning under some bushes, where it might have lain not only all night, but for several days. The circumstantial evidence against the accused was too strong to be controverted except by an alibi; consequently there was no ground for the defense to stand on. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty. Miles O'Brien was brought up for sentence.

"Have you anything to say why the sentence of death should not be passed upon you?" asked the judge.

"I am innocent of the crime. My wife and I never had but one serious quarrel, and I never expected that it would be lasting."

The judge then made some preliminary remarks on the devilish brutality of a man who would kill his wife with a club and was about to pronounce the final words which would consign Miles O'Brien to the gallows when there was a commotion among those gathered in the back of the courtroom and a woman came pushing her way down the aisle. Rushing to the prisoner, she threw her arms about him, he, though astonished, returning the embrace.

"Who are you?" asked the judge.
"His wife."
When the commotion consequent upon this sudden return to life of a murdered woman who had come to save her husband from the penalty of having killed her had subsided, the judge asked Mrs. O'Brien to give an account of her whereabouts since her parting with her husband.

"After he left me," she said, "I concluded to shut up the house and go up into the country to my mother, who lives on a farm. They don't take a newspaper up there, so I didn't hear of my husband's arrest. But I found I couldn't live without him and came back to learn what had become of him and, if I could find him, ask his forgiveness. When I got home, I heard he had been tried for my murder and was to be sentenced this morning."

"Have you a twin sister?"
"No, your honor."
The judge sat stupefied. Twelve good and true men under his legal guidance had pronounced Miles O'Brien guilty of having killed the woman who was weeping over him and covering him with kisses. In another moment the convicted man would have been legally guilty of the crime.

"You are discharged," said the judge to the prisoner. "Court is adjourned." And, rising from his elevated judicial chair, he descended to the floor and stalked out of the room.

Miles and Molly O'Brien lived happily together after the lesson they had received for years before the error in identification was unraveled. Then it came out that soon after they left their home a band of thieves broke into the house and robbed it. One of them was a woman not unlike Mrs. O'Brien. She arrayed herself in Molly O'Brien's best apparel and put on her jewelry. One of her companions accused her of appropriating more than her share of the plunder. This led to a fight, and the woman was killed. Hearing or fancying they heard approaching footsteps, the robbers left her under a bush without stopping to remove even the jewels.

PAY HONOR TO EZRA CORNELL

Centennial Celebration of Birth of Founder of College

Special to Evening Teller.
ITHACA, N. Y., March 27.—Arrangements for the celebration of the centennial of the birth of Ezra Cornell, founder of Cornell university, and the dedication of the new buildings of the New York state college of agriculture have been completed. The exercises will be held one month from today and will extend over two days. The first day will be devoted to the Cornell centennial celebration and the second to the dedication of the new college buildings. Andrew Carnegie of the board of trustees has been selected to deliver the principal address on Ezra Cornell. Founders Great College

The faculty has selected as its spokesman Andrew D. White, first president of the university, and the alumni committee has selected Senator Joseph B. Foraker, class of '69, and Dr. Starr Jordan, class of '72, president of Leland Stanford Jr., university. Ezra Cornell, whose memory it is proposed to honor on so elaborate a scale, won the gratitude of posterity not only by founding the great institution which bears his name, but by other works as well.

He was born on a farm at Westchester Landing, N. Y., Jan. 11, 1807, and was of Quaker ancestry. As a youth he followed the several occupations of millwright, machinist and farmer.

Was Interested in Telegraphy.
At the age of 21 he walked from De Ruyter, N. Y., whither his family had moved soon after his birth, to Ithaca, where he continued as miller and mechanic for 13 years.

He had a prominent part in the erection of the first experimental telegraph lines. He was 34 years old when he had made the acquaintance of Mr. Smith of Portland, Maine, who had the contract to lay under ground the lead pipe containing the four insulated wires of the projected Morse telegraph between Washington and Baltimore.

Cornell already had displayed considerable inventive genius, and at Mr. Smith's suggestion he put his mind to producing a machine that would excavate a narrow trench about two feet in depth, lay the wire within it and cover it over, all at one operation.

Co-operates With Morse.
This led to an acquaintance with Professor Morse and later, when it was found impossible to have perfect insulation, Cornell suggested to Morse that the telegraph wires be strung on poles.

Builds Line in New York.
This suggestion was carried out and Cornell began to make money out of his contracts to erect telegraph lines.

He built the line between New York and Albany, and when he had made enough money to carry out his plan he built several lines in the western states.

Why So Weak?

Kidney Troubles May be Sapping Your Life Away.—Lewiston People

Have Learned This Fact.
When a healthy man or woman begins to run down without apparent cause, becomes weak, languid, depressed, suffers backache, headache, dizzy spells and urinary disorders, look to the kidneys for the cause of it all. Keep the kidneys well and they will keep you well. Doan's Kidney Pills cure sick kidneys and keep them well.

William Lane, living at south of Baker City, Ore., says: "The use of one box of Doan's Kidney Pills procured was sufficient to convince me that there is nothing to equal this remedy for curing backache and kidney complaint. Heavy work, lifting lumber all day long and exposure to bad weather seemed to affect my kidneys so that my back was sore and I could not rest well at night, feeling tired out and lame in the morning. Every cold I took settled on my kidneys and made my condition worse. Finally being induced to try Doan's Kidney Pills I found relief in a short time, and soon was rid of the lameness and backache."
