REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

By Adele Garrison

"DO YOU REALIZE WHAT A ROMANTIC FIGURE YOUR ELDERLY ADMIRER, MR. GORDON, IS?"

"Would you prefer to go up on the top deck, or stay down here?" "The upper deck by all means. I brought my sunshade on purpose."

We threaded our way through the crowded parlors and the sheltered lower decks on the big Hudson river steamer. People were madly rushing about trying to secure choice seats, where they would be sheltered from the autumn breeze, and yet able to see the shores of the river.

"What a meal for a hungry squirrel!" Dicky commented satirically. "These people are all here because they want an outing on the river, then they try to get seats sheltered so that no breeze can reach them."

"I'm glad they're so foolish!" I responded lightly, as we mounted the last flight of stairs leading to the upper deck. "Just suppose they were all as sensible as we are, this deck would be so crowded we couldn't get a seat."

Dicky threw back his head and laughed heartily. "Good comfortable working philosophy you have there," he commented. "You'll have your choice of seats up here. Where do you want to sit?"

"Just as near the front of the boat as I can get," I returned. "How are these?"

Dicky adroitly stepped in front of four rapid looking youths and girls, and placed two deck chairs in the very bow of the boat. It was a niche in which the two chairs just fitted cozily.

Events in Retrospect. The shrill voice of one of the girls in the quarter Dicky had forestalled roared in exhortation.

"What did you see that big stiff get ahead of you for?" she demanded of her escort.

"Aw! cut it out, Jen," the deprecatory masculine voice replied. "I couldn't help the guy's getting in there first; besides, there isn't room for four chairs in that place any way. If we put our chairs just behind them we can all four sit together. I thought that was what you wanted."

"It was," Jen admitted. Then her voice rose truculently. "But I hate to see a swell get away with anything like that."

As she subsided, still grumbling, into a deck chair directly behind us, Dicky's knee nudged mine gleefully. "Terrible this eternal clash between the mawsses and the classwesses," he drawled, with a wink that nearly convulsed me: "aren't you and your station in life definitely settled?"

I smiled happily at his nonsense. It meant more to me than Dicky's light talk usually did, for he had been distrustful and moodyly silent at intervals since the dinner at the Hotel Sydenham the evening before, when he had brought the mysterious Mr. Gordon to our table.

I knew that he had wondered at and had resented the cordial invitation I had given Mr. Gordon to come to our home. I wondered at myself. Things looked very different to me in the bracing autumn air of the morning than they did in the perfume-laden atmosphere of the luxurious Sydenham grill.

The night before Mr. Gordon's mellow tones had poured into my ears the story of his early love for my mother and father, his recognition of my remarkable resemblance to my mother, and his pursuit of me until he had found out my identity.

The recital had thrilled me, swept me from my usual poise and self-possession.

When to his plea of loneliness and his tremulous request to be allowed to visit us, sometimes Dicky had presented merely an unwilling formal, courteous assent, I had grown disconcerted to the winds and had told the melancholy and mysterious stranger that I would gladly welcome the opportunity to have him tell me of my mother's youth.

What Dicky Said. Mr. Gordon had left our table directly after my invitation, telling Dicky that when we returned from our trip to the Catskills he would call upon us.

Dicky had not mentioned his name since, but I knew that he did not like the interest I took in the man. I knew it was not ordinary jealousy.

Women's War Work

NETS FOR NUTRITION.

Bright, crisp October mornings, and time to put on the children's warm, brown sweaters and red tan o'shanter, and go out into the country, nutting.

In the old days we went because it was picnic. Those were the days when we thought of nuts as merely something to nibble if we had time to linger and talk together after the Sunday dinner. Then we did not think so much about calories and food values and conservation.

Now we know that the incidental nut of the by-gone Sunday dinner is a highly important food.

Delicious soups may be made of chestnuts or peanuts, and these two are good in sandwiches, croquettes, salads and cakes. Peanut butter is wholesome and makes a good filling for sandwiches for the children's school lunch box.

The combination of nuts and fruit is excellent in food values and patriotism, too, because these are articles that we are not asked to save, that are locally grown, and that we are not sending to our army abroad.

Nuts and raisins are an ideal war dessert. In the summer fruit is sufficient, but now that winter is coming, and more heat-giving food is needed in our diet, just add nuts and serve, and there you are—well-fed and patriotic—and you have saved some sugar for Sammy's sugar bowl.

And the best part of it is that now in the days when we are learning not to waste anything, a use has been found even for the shells of the nuts. They make them into carbon for gas masks for soldiers. So the children who had such fun gathering the nuts and eating them, can have the pleasure of saving all the shells and taking them to the Red Cross where they will be packed into bags and sent away for their last stage of usefulness. For this purpose, however, only the shells of walnuts, butternuts, and hickory nuts are used.

So, pack the lunch boxes, get off to the woods and come home at the end of the autumn afternoon with baskets of beautiful shiny pecans, hard little hickory nuts, ripe brown chestnuts, and big, fat walnuts!
