Revelations of a Wife

Their Second Honeymoon BY ADELE GARRISON.

WHY MADGE TRANSFERRED HER LUNCHEON TO A VERANDA TABLE.

The vague menace I had sensed when I faced the crowd of Teutonic celebrants in the inn dining-room seemed to hover over me all through the elaborate luncheon which I had ordered because of my wish to have plenty of time to watch the metamorphosed windmill.

That any one of the group of persons at the next table could cheerfully have swung my neck I was sure. Their faces were dark and lowering, the few glances I encountered hostile, although they were careful to keep their eyes averted from me.

If I hadn't been so uneasy I could have laughed at the painful precision and diction of their English. They were evidently trying to erase the impression of gabbling gutturals which I had heard when I first stepped into the dining room.

Such a trick was impossible, however, under the furtive watching eyes of the men and women at the other table. I thought hard for a moment, then summoned the waiter, hovering near.

"I think I would like to finish my dinner at one of the little tables on the veranda," I said, giving as good an imitation as I could of a bored woman with a sudden caprice to gratify. "Please take the wine out there, and bring my salad and berries and coffee to me there."

I handed him a piece of silver as I spoke. His show of gratitude didn't hide the consternation in his eyes.

"I am afraid madame will not be comfortable out there," he stammered.

"I will be the judge of that," I returned, curtly. "Please bring the things at once."

Conscious that every eye was following me, I preceded the disappearing waiter to the veranda, ready to choose a table which should not be directly beneath a window.

There was another reason for my decision to transfer the location of my table than my wish to camouflage my abstinence from Mme. Hofer's wine. I had a distinct longing for the sight of Pete's punishing jaw and powerful frame.

But when I reached the veranda, Pete was nowhere to be seen.

What in the world is the matter with all the girls?

I have had 18 letters from girls this week and they are all about wanting to be popular. Not wanting to be successful, not wanting to be wise, not wanting to be kind, not wanting to be good, not even wanting to be happy—just wanting to be popular.

"Oh, if I could only be popular," writes one girl. "I'd give 10 years of my life if I could go into a room at a party and have everybody glad to see me. My sister can't. She isn't pretty and she isn't especially bright, but everybody's just crazy about her—old men and boys and college youths and fellows just out of high school. Even the women like her. She is awfully nice. I know, but I don't see what it is about her that makes her so many friends."

"Won't you please tell me how to be popular?" writes another girl. "I am young and not unattractive. I wear good clothes and I am a good dancer, nothing special, of course. No, you don't have to be a flirt to be popular. You can just be a nice, good-natured, light-hearted girl who enjoys living and isn't ashamed to show it."

"Come out of your shell and unlock the door of your prison. Everybody's lonesome, really, just as lonesome as you are. Make it your business to cheer them up and you'll be so popular you'll have to put in an extension on the family telephone to give anybody else a chance at all."

"What can I do to make myself more popular?"

"Dear me, child, if I only had a recipe for popularity I'd be a millionaire in a week."

But, whisper, there's one sure way of making yourself interesting to men, women or child.

No, you don't have to scintillate, you don't have to blush, you don't have to flatter—not really in so many words. All you have to do is to talk to everyone you know, not about your affairs or about what interests you, but about their affairs and what interests them.

KENNETT AND GOOD HOLD STEADFASTLY TO ORIGINAL STORY

had been straightened out, "but I did not go to him."

Hold to Story. "We have told the police and the officials of the corporation all we know about this thing, and we are still willing to do all we can to help settle this matter," said Mr. Good.

"I am willing to sign any affidavit the corporation officials want me to sign," said Kennett. "That is, any affidavit that contains the truth, he conditioned. I have already signed one affidavit telling about the burning of the 22 bonds, and I am willing to do everything I can."

Men Not Despondent. Both men were clear-eyed. Neither seemed despondent, but both appeared to realize the seriousness of their present situation. Both were cleaned shaved and neatly dressed, although Kennett had discarded his coat.

A successful business man wholly out of place behind the bars, Kennett smiled sincerely when he declared that he is willing to aid the corporation and police officials in completely unraveling the bond mystery.

"I am glad we did not get any money out of it," commented Mr. Good. "It used to worry me a great deal, and I often thought about the money I thought I was going to get, and I often wondered if the money would really do me any good."

Both men seemed grateful to the police for the way in which their arrest was handled. They wanted to see the newspapers. They had not seen a paper since their arrest early Thursday morning.
