

From the Boston Times.
AN HOUR IN THE PENITENTIARY.

During our sojourn in Philadelphia, last summer, we one day accepted an invitation to visit the Penitentiary there. We had letters to the kind-hearted Warden, Mr. Scattergood, (a most appropriate name, by the way) who extended to us all the courtesy we could have desired. We were conducted through the Prison, and in company with Mr. S. we entered several of the cells. The Superintendent learning we were from Boston, informed us that a prisoner was confined there, for passing counterfeit money, who hailed from Massachusetts. He had been there some two or three years, and we found him a very intelligent man. His cell was exceedingly clean, and upon a table in the corner, we discovered several standard books, a bible, &c., which gave evidence of having been thoroughly read by the prisoner. He was said to be very industrious, and certainly appeared comfortable under the circumstances. His name was George... He remarked that he was very glad to see any one from Boston, and seriously regretted that he should have been one of the few Bostonians, comparatively, who had disgraced the honored name of the Old Bay State. He was happy, apparently, and as we parted, we shook his hand, and remarked that it was possible we might call on him again in a few weeks. 'You will be sure, Sir, to find me at home,' said he with a smile, as we left the door of his cell!

As we entered the reception room once more, a bulky despatch was handed to the Warden by one of his deputies, and upon opening it, he informed us that it was a pardon for one of the convicts. We enquired if it would encroach upon the prison rules under such circumstances, to accompany the Warden to the cell, while he should read it to the prisoner, and were kindly informed that we could join him. We soon reached the cell, where we found a fresh-faced young man, of perhaps twenty-four, who was busily engaged at a little loom, weaving.

'Good morning, John,' said the Warden, blandly, as we entered.

'Good morning, Sir.'

'These keeps busy, John?'

'Oh, yes Sir, but it's very dull.'

'Does the tire of work, John?'

'No Sir—but I think of home.'

'And there would like to visit home once more?'

'Oh, Sir—if I could but do so—'

'And there would not return again?'

'I would try to deserve better, Sir.'

'Well, John what would thee say, if I should tell thee I had a pardon for thee?'

'Oh, Sir, such news would be too good.'

'But there would like to hear it?'

'I care not for myself, so much,' said the poor prisoner, and tears filled his eyes—but for my wife and child, I would be so happy—'

'And there would shun wicked company, John?'

'Oh yes, and I would labor for my wife and little one—'

'Well, John, here is thy pardon,' continued the good old man—and he read the document which freed this unfortunate being, who had been the dupe of other knaves. We had the pleasure of seeing him released, after a three years confinement, and of learning that he joined his young family, to whom he has since been a faithful guardian.

We passed out to the ante-room again—where we encountered a new comer, who had just reached the prison as we entered. He had been sent up for five years, on a charge of embezzlement.

He was elegantly attired in the latest style of fashion, and possessed all the non-chalance and devil-mo-care appearance of a genteel roddy. He twirled his watch chain, looked particularly knowing at a couple of ladies who chanced to be present, and seemed utterly indifferent about himself or the predicament he was placed in! The Warden read his commitment, and addressed him with—

'Charles, I am sorry to see thee here.'

'It can't be helped, old fellow?'

'What is thy age, Charles?'

'Twenty-three.'

'A Philadelphian?'

'Well—kinder, and kinder not?'

'There has disgraced thyself, sadly.'

'Well I ain't troubled, old cock.'

'That looks not like a rogue.'

'Matter of opinion?'

'There was well situated,—'

'Yes—well enough—'

'In good employ?'

'Well—so so.'

'And thee has parents?'

'Yes—'

'Perhaps thee has a mother, Charles.' The convict had been standing during this brief dialogue perfectly unconcerned and reckless, until this last interrogatory was put. Had a thunderbolt struck him he could not have fallen more sudden than he did when the name of "mother" fell on his ear! He sank into a chair—a torrent of tears gushed from his eyes—the very fountain of his heart seemed to have burst on the instant! He recovered, partially—and said impromptu to the Warden—

'Don't you, sir—for God's sake don't call her name in this dreadful place! Do what you may with me, but don't mention that name to me!'

There were tears in other eyes besides the prisoner's, and an aching silence pervaded the group who surrounded the unfortunate convict.

The black cap was drawn over his eyes, he was led to an adjoining apartment and stripped, and shortly afterwards he re-appeared upon the corridor. He passed silently on, in charge of a deputy keeper, to a lonely cell in a distant part of the prison, the door creaked on its hinges, he disappeared, the chain dropped from the outside bolts, and Charles—was a close prisoner for five long years to come!

We left the prison with heavy hearts, relieved however by the reflection that this was one of the best devised institutions of its kind in the world, (notwithstanding the libels of Charles Dickens) and that its administration in the hands of Mr. Scattergood secured to its unfortunate inmates the most "equal and exact justice."

A CARD.
