

Faulkes is in the City Hospital now. He is dying. Mrs. Dauria is there, too. She also is dying.

Detective Fisher of the Lackawanna Railroad saw the fight and telephoned for the reserves.

The reserves came and plowed a bloody path through the strikers, who dispersed. Then the seven wounded were picked up.

MASSACHUSETTS FACING INDUSTRIAL CRISIS

Boston, Mass., June 5.—Massachusetts is today facing the greatest industrial crisis in its history.

In Boston, the relations between the Boston Elevated Street Railway company, grow hourly more strained.

The Elevated has discharged 100 of its oldest employes for talking trade unionism. It also has formed 1,000 of its employes into what it calls a "protective" organization. The purpose of this organization is to fight the union.

The employes realize the gravity of the situation; realize the Elevated has declared war on all the principles of Trade Unionism.

The managers of the Parker House, the Touraine and Young's hotels, the largest in the city, have been notified by their waiters that they must recognize the Waiters' union.

Twenty waiters went on strike today at the Olympia hotel; those employed at the Torino and Highlands hotels served a 24-hour ultimatum on the managers.

At Clinton, in textile manufacturing district, 800 weavers are on strike. Heavy guards of reserve police have been ordered on duty in the mill districts. Evidently the employers expect trouble.

At Lawrence, where the Industrial Workers of the World won their great victory early in the year, there is a hint of future trouble. Members of the I. W. W. have been fired for their part in winning that victory. Their fellows are standing by them, and the Lawrence police today are swearing in deputies.

NOBODY KNOWS

"I'd have you know, Mrs. Blythe," said Mrs. King, "that my brother was a banister of the law." Mrs. Blythe turned up her nose scornfully. "A fig for your banisters," she retored, "that's nothing. I have a brother who is a corridor in the navy."—Satire.
