Flight of Pup Skies—By Alfred C. Pickels

Cottonwood Point, May 15—Today was another fine day for the aviators. The weather was perfect for a flight. The sky was clear, and the wind was blowing gently from the east.

The pilot, a young man, took his seat in the cockpit and started the engine. The plane rose slowly into the air. As it gained height, it began to climb at a steady rate.

The plane reached a height of one thousand feet and then began to descend. The pilot performed some maneuvers, including a loop and a barrel roll.

The plane then climbed again to a height of five thousand feet. The pilot performed another loop, this time in the opposite direction.

The plane descended back to the ground and touched down gently. The pilot shut off the engine and stepped out of the cockpit.

The flight was a success, and the pilot was pleased with himself for having completed it so well.
